P 523-230852-6★$1.50

The exciting story of the Barbarian War Lord who conquered half the world!

GENGHIS KHAN

by Harold Lamb

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2026

https://archive.org/details/genghiskhan0000hlam

THE LEGEND, THE MAN

What is the mystery that surrounds Genghis Khan?

More gigantic in historical literature than Alexander, the Ceasars, Napoleon, or Hitler . . . 750 years ago, Genghis Khan, the great Mongolian war lord conquered half the world. A nomad, a hunter and herder of beasts, he outgeneraled the powers of three empires. He was a barbarian who had never seen a city and did not know the use of writing, yet drew up a code of laws for fifty nations which survived for centuries.

Let us turn back the hands of the clock and look at Genghis Khan as he is revealed in the chronicles of his day. Not at the spectacle, or the incarnation of barbaric power, but at the man himself . . .

WRITE FOR OUR FREE CATALOG

If there is a Pinnacle Book you want but can't find locally, it is available from us—simply send the title and price plus 25¢ to cover mailing and handling costs to:

PINNACLE BOOKS
275 Madison Avenue
New York, New York 10016

___Check here if you want to receive our catalog regularly.

___Check here if you wish to know when the next_____will be published.

GENGHIS KHAN

by Harold Lamb

PINNACLE BOOKS • NEW YORK CITY

GENGHIS KHAN

Copyright, 1927 by Harold Lamb

All rights reserved, including the right to reproduce this book or portions thereof in any form.

An original Pinnacle Books edition, published for the first time anywhere.

ISBN: 0-523-00852-X

First printing, May 1976

Cover illustration by Ken Kelly

Printed in the United States of America

PINNACLE BOOKS, INC.
275 Madison Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10016

"SCRIPTUM EST DE SAPIENTE: IN TERRAM ALIENARUM GENTIUM TRANSBIT, BONA ET MALA IN OMNIBUS TENTABIT. HIC OPUS FECI: SED UTINAM UT SAPIENS ET NON STULTUS. MULTI ENIM FACIUNT QUOD FACIT SAPIENS, SED NON SAPIENTUR, SED MAGIS STULTE."

"God in Heaven. The Kha Khan, the Power of God, on Earth. The seal of the Emperor of Mankind."

THE SEAL OF GENGHIS KHAN

Contents

FOREWORD

THE MYSTERY 1

PART I

I THE DESERT 9

II THE STRUGGLE TO LIVE 17

III THE BATTLE OF THE CARTS . . 25

IV TEMUJIN AND THE TORRENTS . . 33

V WHEN THE STANDARD STOOD ON GUPTA 41

VI PRESTER JOHN DIES 49

VII THE YASSA 57

PART II

VIII CATHAY 65

IX THE GOLDEN EMPEROR . . . 75

X THE RETURN OF THE MONGOLS . . 81

XI KARAKORUM 89

PART III

XII THE SWORD-ARM OF ISLAM . . 99

XIII THE MARCH WESTWARD . . . 109

XIV THE FIRST CAMPAIGN . . . 115

XV BOKHARA 121

XVI THE RIDE OF THE ORKHONS . . 131

XVII GENGHIS KHAN GOES HUNTING . . 137

XVIII THE GOLDEN THRONE OF TULI . . 143
XIX THE ROAD MAKERS 151
XX THE BATTLE OF THE INDUS . . 159
XXI THE COURT OF THE PALADINS . . 167
XXII THE END OF THE TASK . . . 171

Part IV

AFTERWORD 177

Notes

I THE MASSACRES 187
II THE LAWS OF GENGHIS KHAN . . 189
III PRESTER JOHN OF ASIA . . . 191
IV THE NUMERICAL STRENGTH OF THE MONGOL HORDE 192
V THE MONGOL PLAN OF INVASION . 194
VI SUBOTAI BAHADUR VS. MIDDLE EUROPE 196
VII WHAT EUROPE THOUGHT OF THE MONGOLS 200
VIII CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE EUROPEAN MONARCHS AND THE MONGOLS 202
IX THE GRANDSON OF GENGHIS KHAN IN THE HOLY LAND 205
X YE LIU CHUTSAI, THE SAGE OF CATHAY 206
XI OGOTAI AND HIS TREASURE . . 207
XII THE LAST COURT OF THE NOMADS . 210
BIBLIOGRAPHY 223
INDEX 231

List of Illustrations

	Facing page
Genghis Khan assumes lordship of all Mongols	10
Genghis Khan presented with gifts	26
Old engraving of Genghis Khan	50
Another old engraving of the Khan	66
Khan's menagerie (from the French)	82
Mongol yurts on the move	100
Chinese emperor taking omen with bow	144
Ancient Chinese war chariot	160

Maps

Eastern Asia, at the end of the twelfth century	42
The Kharesmian Empire	122

Genghis Khan

Foreword

THE MYSTERY

SEVEN HUNDRED YEARS AGO a man almost conquered the earth. He made himself master of half the known world, and inspired humankind with a fear that lasted for generations.

In the course of his life he was given many names—the Mighty Manslayer, the Scourge of God, the Perfect Warrior, and the Master of Thrones and Crowns. He is better known to us as Genghis Khan.

Unlike most rulers of men, he deserved all his titles. We Americans, raised in the European tradition, have been taught the roster of the great that begins with Alexander of Macedon, continues through the Caesars, and ends with Napoleon. Genghis Khan was a conqueror of more gigantic stature than the well known actors of the European stage.

Indeed it is difficult to measure him by ordinary standards. When he marched with his horde, it was over degrees of latitude and longitude instead of miles; cities in his path were often obliterated, and rivers diverted from their courses; deserts were peopled with the fleeing and dying, and when he had passed, wolves and ravens often were the sole living things in once populous lands.

This destruction of human life bewilders the modern imagination—enriched though it be by the concepts of the Second World War. Genghis Khan, a nomad chieftain who emerged from the Gobi Desert, waged war upon the civilized peoples of the earth and was victorious.

We must turn back to the thirteenth century for a realization of what this meant. We find the Muhammadans convinced that such an upheaval of earthly things could only be caused by a supernatural visitation. The end of the world, palpably, was at hand. "Never," cries the chronicler, "was Islam in such case, divided between the inroads of the Nazarenes and the Mongol."

And consternation filled all Christendom, a generation after the death of Genghis Khan, when the terrible Mongol horsemen were riding over western Europe, when Boleslas of Poland and Bela of Hungary fled from stricken fields, and Henry, Duke of Silesia, died under the Mongol arrows with his Teutonic Knights at Liegnitz—sharing the fate of the Grand-Duke George of Russia—and fair Queen Blanche of Castile cried to Saint Louis, "My son, where art thou?"

A cooler head, Frederick II of Germany, wrote to Henry III of England that the "Tatars" must be no less than the punishment of God, visited upon Christendom for its sins, and the Tatars themselves the descendants of the missing ten tribes of Israel who had worshipped the golden calf and had been penned up for their idolatry within the wastes of Asia.

Worthy Roger Bacon expressed his opinion that the Mongols were soldiers of Antichrist, come to reap the last, dreadful harvest.

This belief was strengthened by a curious prophecy attributed by mistake to Saint Jerome, that in the day of Antichrist a race of "Turks" would emerge from the land of Gog and Magog behind the mountains of Asia, a race polluted and unwashed, using neither wine nor salt nor wheat, and would cause universal disaster.

So the Pope called the Council of Lyons partly to devise means of stemming the Mongol tide, and stout and venerable John of Plano Carpini, friar of the order of minorities, was sent forth as legate of the apostolic See to the Mongols, "Because we dreaded that the nearest and most imminent danger to the Church of God arose from them."

And prayers were offered up in the churches for deliverance from the fury of the Mongol.

If this devastation, this arresting of human progress, had been the whole of his story, Genghis Khan would have been no more than a second Attila, or Alaric—a formidable wanderer without a purpose. But the Scourge was also the Perfect Warrior and Master of Thrones and Crowns.

And here we are face to face with the mystery that surrounds Genghis Khan. A nomad, a hunter and herder of beasts, outgeneraled the powers of three empires; a barbarian who had never seen a city and did not know the use of writing drew up a code of laws for fifty peoples.

In the matter of military genius Napoleon would appear to be the most brilliant of Europeans. But we cannot forget that he abandoned one army to its fate in Egypt, and left the remnant of another in the snows of Russia, and finally strutted into the débâcle of Waterloo. His empire fell about his ears, his Code was torn up and his son disinherited before his death. The whole celebrated affair smacks of the theater and Napoleon himself of the play-actor.

Of necessity we must turn to Alexander of Macedon, that reckless and victorious youth, to find a conquering genius the equal of Genghis Khan—Alexander the god-like, marching with his phalanx toward the rising sun, bearing with him the blessing of Greek culture. Both died in the full tide of victory, and their names survive in the legends of Asia to-day.

Only after death the measure of their achievements differs beyond comparison. Alexander's generals were soon fighting among themselves for the kingdoms from which his son was forced to flee.

So utterly had Genghis Khan made himself master from Armenia to Korea, from Tibet to the Volga that his son entered upon his heritage without protest, and his grandson Kubilai Khan still ruled half the world.

This empire, conjured up out of nothing by a barbarian has mystified historians. The most recent general history of his era compiled by learned persons in England admits that it is an inexplicable fact. A worthy savant pauses to wonder at "The fateful personality of Genghis Khan which, at bottom, we can no more account for than the genius of Shakespeare."

Many things have contributed to keep the personality of Genghis Khan hidden from us. For one thing the Mongols could not write, or did not care to do so. In consequence the annals of his day exist only in the scattered writings of the Ugurs, the Chinese, the Persians and Armenians. Not until recently was the saga of the Mongol Ssanang Setzen satisfactorily translated.

So the most intelligent chroniclers of the great Mongol were his enemies—a fact that must not be forgotten in judging him. They were men of an alien race. Moreover, like the Europeans of the thirteenth century, their conception of the world as it existed outside their own land was very hazy.

They beheld the Mongol, emerging unheralded out of obscurity. They felt the terrible impact of the Mongol horde, and watched it pass over them to other lands, unknown to them. One Muhammadan summed up sadly in these words his experience with the Mongols, "They came, they mined, they slew—trussed up their loot and departed."

The difficulty of reading and comparing these various sources has been great. Not unnaturally, the orientologists who have succeeded in doing so have contented themselves mainly with the political details of the Mongol conquests. They present Genghis Khan to us as a kind of incarnation of barbaric power—a scourge that comes every so often out of the desert to destroy decadent civilizations.

The saga of Ssanang Setzen does not help to explain the mystery. It says, quite simply, that Genghis Khan was a bogdo of the race of gods. Instead of a mystery, we have a miracle.

The medieval chronicles of Europe incline, as we have seen, toward a belief in a sort of Satanic power invested in the Mongol and let loose on Europe.

All this is rather exasperating—that modern historians should reëcho the superstitions of the thirteenth century. Especially of a thirteenth century Europe that beheld the nomads of Genghis Khan only as shadowy invaders.

There is a simple way of getting light on the mystery that surrounds Genghis Khan. This way is to turn back the hands of the clock seven hundred years and look at Genghis Khan as he is revealed in the chronicles of his day, not at the miracle, or the incarnation of barbaric power, but at the man himself.

We will not concern ourselves with the political achievements of the Mongols as a race, but with the man who raised the Mongols from an unknown tribe to world mastery.

To visualize this man, we must actually approach him, among his people and on the surface of the earth as it existed seven hundred years ago. We cannot measure him by the standards of modern civilization. We must view him in the aspects of a barren world peopled by hunters, horse-riding and reindeer-driving nomads.

Here, men clothe themselves in the skins of animals, and nourish themselves on milk and flesh. They grease their bodies to keep out cold and moisture. It is even odds whether they starve or freeze to death, or are cut down by the weapons of other men.

"Here are no towns or cities," says valiant Fra Carpini, the first European to enter this land, "but everywhere sandy barrens, not a hundredth part of the whole being fertile except where it is watered by rivers, which are very rare.

"This land is nearly destitute of trees, although well adapted for the pasturage of cattle. Even the emperor and princes and all others warm themselves and cook their victuals with fires of horse and cow dung.

"The climate is very intemperate, as in the middle of summer there are terrible storms of thunder and lightning by which many people are killed, and even then there are great falls of snow and such tempests of cold winds blow that sometimes people can hardly sit on horseback. In one of these we had to throw ourselves down on the ground and could not see through the prodigious dust. There are often showers of hail, and sudden, intolerable heats followed by extreme cold"—

This is the Gobi Desert, A.D. 1162, the Year of the Swine in the calendar of the Twelve Beasts.

Part One

CHAPTER I

THE DESERT

LIFE DID NOT MATTER very much in the Gobi. Lofty plateaus, wind-swept, lying close to the clouds. Reed bordered lakes, visited by migratory winged creatures on their way to the northern tundras. Huge Lake Baïkul visited by all the demons of the upper air. In the clear nights of mid-winter, the flare of the northern lights rising and falling above the horizon.

Children of this corner of the northern Gobi were not hardened to suffering; they were born to it. After they were weaned from their mother's milk to mare's milk they were expected to manage for themselves.

The places nearest the fire in the family tent belonged to the grown warriors and to guests. Women, it is true, could sit on the left side, but at a distance, and the boys and girls had to fit in where they could.

So with food. In the spring when horses and cows began to give milk in quantity, all was very well. The sheep grew fatter, too. Game was more abundant and the hunters of the tribe would bring in deer and even a bear instead of the lean fur-bearing animals like the fox, marten and sable. Everything went into the pot and was eaten—the able-bodied men taking the first portions, the aged and the women received the pot next, and the children had to fight for bones and sinewy bits. Very little was left for the dogs.

In the winter when the cattle were lean the children did not fare so well. Milk existed then only in the form of kumiss—milk placed in leather sacks and fermented and beaten. It was nourishing and slightly intoxicating, for young chap of three or four years—if he could contriv to beg or steal some. Meat failing, boiled millet served t take the edge off hunger after a fashion.

The end of winter was the worst of all for the youngsters No more cattle could be killed off without thinning th herds too much. At such a time the warriors of the trib were usually raiding the food reserves of another tribe carrying off cattle and horses.

The children learned to organize hunts of their own stalking dogs and rats with clubs or blunt arrows. The learned to ride, too, on sheep, clinging to the wool.

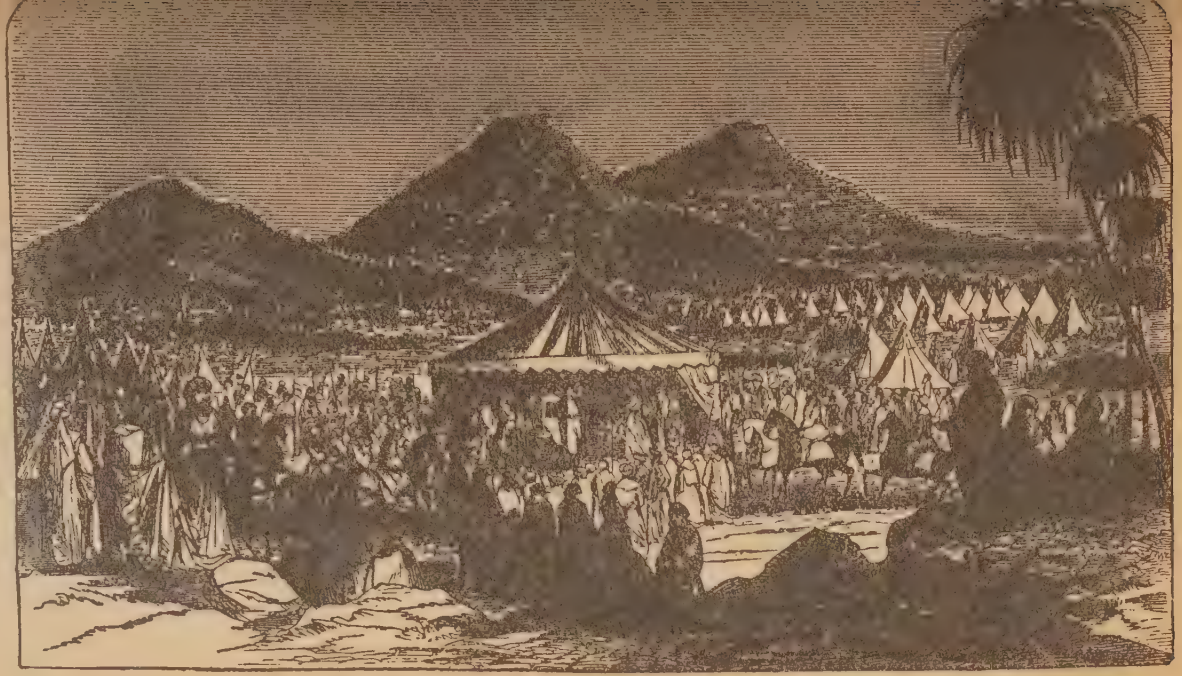
Endurance was the first heritage of Genghis Khan whose birth name was Temujin.[1] At the time of his birth hi father had been absent on a raid against a tribal enem Temujin by name. The affair went well both home an afield, the enemy was made prisoner, and the father, re turning, gave to his infant son the name of the captiv foeman.

His home was a tent made of felt stretched over a frame work of wattled rods with an aperture at the top to let ou the smoke. This was coated with white lime and orna mented with pictures. A peculiar kind of tent, this yurt tha wandered all over the prairies mounted on a cart draw by a dozen or more oxen. Serviceable, too, because it dome-like shape enabled it to stand the buffeting of th wind, and it could be taken down at need.

The married women of the chieftains—and Temujin' father was a chieftain—all had their own ornamented yurt in which their children lived. It was the duty of the girl to attend to the yurt, to keep the fire burning on the ston hearth under the opening that let the smoke out. One o Temujin's sisters, standing on the platform of the car before the entrance flap, would manage the oxen whe they were on the move. The shaft of one cart would b tied to the axle of another and would creak and roll i this fashion over the level grassland where, more ofte than not, no single tree or bit of rising ground was to b seen.

In the yurt were kept the family treasures, carpets fron

[1] Temujin signifies "The Finest Steel"—Tumur-ji. The Chinese version is T'i mou jen, which has another meaning altogether, "Supreme Earth Man."



Genghis Khan assumes lordship of all Mongols

Bokhara or Kabul, looted probably from some caravan—chests filled with women's gear, silk garments bartered from a shrewd Arab trader, and inlaid silver. More important were the weapons that hung on the walls, short Turkish scimitars, spears, ivory or bamboo bow cases—arrows of different lengths and weights, and perhaps a round shield of tanned leather, lacquered over.

These, too, were looted or purchased, passing from hand to hand with the fortunes of war.

Temujin—the youthful Genghis Khan—had many duties. The boys of the family must fish the streams they passed in their trek from the summer to winter pastures. The horse herds were in their charge, and they had to ride afield after lost animals, and to search for new pasture lands. They watched the skyline for raiders, and spent many a night in the snow without a fire. Of necessity, they learned to keep the saddle for several days at a time, and to go without cooked food for three or four days—sometimes without any food at all.

When mutton or horse-flesh was plentiful they feasted and made up for lost time, stowing away incredible amounts against the day of privation. For diversions they had horse races, twenty miles out into the prairie and back, or wrestling matches in which bones were freely broken.

Temujin was marked by great physical strength, and ability to scheme—which is only another way of adapting himself to circumstances. He became the leader of the wrestlers, although he was spare in build. He could handle a bow remarkably well. Not so well as his brother Kassar who was called the Bowman. But Kassar was afraid of Temujin.

They formed an alliance of two against their hardy half brothers, and the first incident related of Temujin is the slaying of one of the half brothers, who had stolen a fish from him. Mercy seemed to these nomad youths to be of little value, but retribution was an obligation.

And Temujin became aware of feuds more important than the animosity of boys. His mother, Houlun, was beautiful, and so had been carried off by his father from a neighboring tribe on her wedding ride to the tent of her betrothed husband. Houlun, being both sagacious and willful, made the best of circumstances after a little wailing;

but all in the yurt knew that some day men from her tribe would come to avenge the wrong.

At night by the glowing dung fire Temujin would listen to the tales of the minstrels, old men who rode from one wagon-tent to another carrying a one-stringed fiddle, and singing in a droning voice the tales of a tribe's forebears and heroes.

He was conscious of his strength, and his right of leadership. Was he not the first-born of Yesukai the Valiant, Khan of the Yakka or Great Mongols, master of forty thousand tents?

From the tales of the minstrels he knew that he came of distinguished stock, the Bourchikoun, or Gray-eyed Men. He harkened to the story of his ancestor, Kabul Khan who had pulled the emperor of Cathay by the beard and who had been poisoned as a consequence. He learned that his father's sworn brother was Toghrul Khan of the Karaïts, the most powerful of the Gobi nomads—he who gave birth in Europe to the tales of Prester John of Asia.

But at that time Temujin's horizon was limited by the pasture lands of his tribe, the Yakka Mongols.

"We are not a hundredth part of Cathay," a wise counselor said to the boy, "and the only reason why we have been able to cope with her is that we are all nomads, carrying our supplies with us, and experienced in our kind of warfare. When we can, we plunder; when we cannot, we hide away. If we begin to build towns and change our old habits, we shall not prosper. Besides, monasteries and temples breed mildness of character, and it is only the fierce and warlike who dominate mankind."[2]

When he had served his apprenticeship as herd boy, he was allowed to ride with Yesukai. By all accounts the young Temujin was good to look upon, but remarkable more for the strength of his body and a downright manner than for any beauty of features.

He must have been tall, with high shoulders, his skin a whitish tan. His eyes, set far apart under a sloping forehead, did not slant. And his eyes were green, or blue-gray in the iris, with black pupils. Long reddish-brown hair fell

[2]It must be remembered that the Mongols were not of the same race as the Chinese proper. They were descended from the Tungusi of aboriginal stock, with a strong mixture of Iranian and Turkish blood—a race that is now called Ural-Altaic. These were the nomads of high Asia that the Greeks named Scythians.

in braids to his back. He spoke very little, and then only after meditating on what he would say. He had an ungovernable temper and the gift of winning fast friends.

His wooing was as sudden as his sire's. While father and son were passing the night in the tent of a strange warrior, the boy's attention was attracted by the girl of the tent. He asked Yesukai at once if he could have her for a wife.

"She is young," the father objected.

"When she is older," Temujin pointed out, "she will do well enough."

Yesukai considered the girl, who was nine years of age, and a beauty, by name Bourtai—a name that harked back to the legendary ancestor of the tribe—the Gray-eyed.

"She is small," her father observed, secretly delighted by the interest the Mongols showed, "but still, you might look at her." And of Temujin he approved. "Thy son has a clear face and bright eyes."

So the next day the bargain was struck and the Mongol Khan rode off, leaving Temujin to make the acquaintance of his future bride and father-in-law.

A few days later a Mongol galloped up with word that Yesukai who had passed a night in the tent of some enemies and had presumably been poisoned, lay dying and had asked for Temujin. Although the thirteen-year-old boy rode as fast as a horse could carry him to the ordu or tent village of the clan, he found his father dead.

More than that had happened in his absence. The leading spirits of the clan had discussed matters and two thirds of them had abandoned the standard of the chieftain and had started off to find other protectors. They were afraid to trust themselves and their families and herds to an inexperienced boy.

"The deep water is gone," they said, "the strong stone is broken. What have we to do with a woman and her children?"

Houlun, the wise and courageous, did what she could to avert the break-up of the clan. Taking the standard of the nine yak-tails in her hand she rode after the deserters and pleaded with them persuading some few families to turn back their herds and carts.

Temujin was now seated on the white horseskin, Khan of the Yakka Mongols, but he had no more than the remnant of a clan around him, and he was faced with the certainty that all the feudal foes of the Mongols would take advantage of the death of Yesukai to avenge themselves upon his son.

CHAPTER II

THE STRUGGLE TO LIVE

IN THE TIME OF his great-grandfather Kabul Khan and of his father Yesukai, the Yakka Mongols had enjoyed a kind of over-lordship in the northern Gobi. Being Mongols, as a natural consequence, they had taken to themselves the best of the grazing lands that stretched from Lake Baïkul eastward to the range of mountains known now as the Khingan, on the border of modern Manchuria.

These grazing lands were very desirable, being north of the encroaching sands of the Gobi, between the two fertile valleys of the small rivers Kerulon and Onon. The hills were covered with birch and fir, and game was plentiful, water abundant—due to the late melting of the snows—circumstances only too well known to the clans that had formerly been under the dominion of the Mongol and were now preparing to seize the possessions of the thirteen-year-old Temujin.

Those possessions were of inestimable value to the nomads—fertile grassland, not too bitter cold in the winter, and the herds from which they drew the necessities of life, hair to make felt and ropes to bind the yurts, bone for arrow tips, leather for saddles and kumiss sacks and harness.

Temujin, it seems, might have fled. He could do nothing to avert the coming blow. His vassals, as we may call them, were irresolute and not over-willing to pay the Khan's tithe of cattle to a boy. Besides, they were strung out through all the hills, guarding their own herds against wolves and the inevitable small raiders of early spring-time.

He did not flee. The chronicle relates that he wept for a while, solitary in the yurt. Then he set about the task of leadership. There were his younger brothers to feed, and his sisters and his remaining half brother, who appears to have been devoted to the youngster. Above all, his mother, who knew only too well the inevitable disaster that must overtake her first-born.

Inevitable, because a certain warrior, Targoutai, likewise descended from the Bourchikoun, the Gray-eyed Men, had announced that he was now over-lord of the northern Gobi. Targoutai, chieftain of the Taidjuts, the feudal foes of the Mongols.

And Targoutai—who had persuaded most of Temujin's clansmen to join his standard—must now hunt down the youthful khan of the Mongols, as an older wolf seeks and slays a cub too prone to take the leadership of the pack.

The hunt was launched without warning. Throngs of horsemen galloped up to the Mongol ordu, the tent village, some turning aside to drive off the outlying herds. Targoutai himself made for the tent where the standard stood.

And Temujin with his brothers fled before the onset of the warriors, Kassar, the sturdy bowman, reining in his pony to send a few arrows at his foes. Houlun was suffered to live—Targoutai seeking no one but Temujin.

Thus the hunt began, with the Taidjuts close upon the heels of the boys. The hunters made no great haste. The trail was fresh and clear, and these nomads were accustomed to track down a horse for days if need be. So long as Temujin did not get a fresh mount, they would close in on him.

The boys headed instinctively for the shelter of gorges, with timber growth to screen them. At times they dismounted to hack down trees over the narrow track and hinder the pursuers. When twilight came upon them they separated, the younger brothers and the girls hiding in a cave, Kassar turning off, and Temujin himself riding on toward a mountain that offered concealment.

Here he kept away from the pursuers for days, until hunger made him risk an attempt to lead his horse through the waiting Taidjuts. He was seen, overtaken and brought before Targoutai who commanded that a kang be put upon him—a wooden yoke resting on the shoulders and holding the wrists of a captive prisoned at both ends. Thus fettered, Temujin was led off, the warriors moving back to their own grazing land, driving the captured cattle. And so he remained, helpless until he was left with a single guard while the warriors went off to feast elsewhere. Darkness settled down on the camp, and the young Mongol was in no mood to lose an opportunity to escape.

In the murk of the tent, he struck the head of his guard with the end of the kang, knocking the man senseless. Running from the tent he found the moon risen and a half light through the forest in which the camp had been pitched. Plunging into the brush he made his way toward a river they had crossed the day before. And, hearing the sound of pursuit behind him, he entered the water, sinking down among the rushes near the bank until only his head was above the water.

So situated, he watched the Taidjut riders search the bank for him, and he noticed that one warrior saw him, hesitated and went on without betraying him.

In the kang Temujin was almost as helpless as before, and it took both intuition and daring to do what he next did. He left the river, following the horsemen back into the camp, and crept to the yurt of the warrior who had noticed him among the rushes and had not given him away—a stranger, as it happened, stopping for the nonce with the hunters of this other clan.

At the apparition of the dripping boy the man was more frightened than Temujin. He pitied the captive, and must have reflected that the best thing to do was to rid himself of the youth. So he split the kang and burned up the fragments, hiding Temujin meanwhile in a cart loaded with wool.

It was hot in the loose wool—no pleasant abiding place especially when the Taidjut warriors came to search the tent, and thrust spears into the cart, one of the blades wounding Temujin in the leg.

"The smoke of my house would have vanished and my fire would have died out forever had they found thee," the man remarked grimly to the fugitive, giving him at the same time food and milk and a bow with two arrows. "Go now to thy brothers and mother."

And Temujin, riding a borrowed horse, found his estate little better than that pictured by the stranger—the site of his camp filled with the ashes of fires, his herds gone, his mother and brothers vanished. He tracked them down, and discovered a hungry family in hiding, the stern Houlun, the doughty Kassar, and Belgutai the half brother who idolized him.

They lived after a fashion, traveling by night to the camp of a distant well-wisher, with no more than eight horses in their string, trapping the more miserable game such as marmots and contenting themselves with fish instead of mutton. Temujin learned how to keep out of an ambush, and to break through the lines of men that hunted him down. Hunted he was, and his cunning grew with the years. He was not, apparently, caught a second time.

He might, even then, have fled from his ancestral grazing lands. But the youthful khan had no intention of leaving his heritage to his enemies. He visited the scattered settlements of his clan, demanding gravely the khan's tithe of the four beasts—a camel, ox, horse and sheep—to provide for his mother.

It is noticeable that he refrained from doing two things. Bourtai the Gray-eyed still awaited his coming, to bear her off to his tent and the father of Bourtai was a powerful clansman, a leader of many spears. But Temujin did not go near them.

Nor did he appeal to the aged and influential Toghrul, the "Provider" chieftan of the Karaït Turks who had drunk the oath of comradeship with Yesukai—a bond that entitled the son of one to go at need and claim the other for foster father. A simple matter, perhaps, to ride over the prairies to the Karaïts who lived in walled cities and were possessed of real treasures, precious stones, woven stuffs, fine weapons and even tents of cloth-of-gold —to the Karaïts who were the people of this Prester John of Asia.

"To go as a beggar with empty hands," Temujin argued, "is to arouse scorn, not fellowship."

And he stuck to this determination, which was not a matter of false pride, but a Yakka Mongol's downright way of thinking. Prester John was obligated to aid him—an oath of comradeship is more binding in high Asia than the pledge of a king—but he would not make use of this master of cities and strange wonders until he could appear before him as an ally, not as a fugitive.

Meanwhile his eight horses were stolen.

The affair of the eight horses is worth relating in ful from the chronicle. Prowling Taidjuts were the thieves, and Belgutai was absent at the time on the ninth horse, a certain sorrel mare, the same that had carried Temujin out of the clutches of Targoutai. Belgutai was hunting marmots and when he rode in the young khan went to his side.

"The horses have been stolen."

This was a serious matter, as it put all the brothers but one afoot, at the mercy of any raiders who might come along.

Belgutai offered to go for them.

"Couldst not follow and find them," objected Kassar. "I will go."

"Ye could not find them," said Temujin, "and if ye found them ye could not bring them back. I will go."

And go he did, on the tired sorrel mare, picking up the trail of the riders and the eight horses, and following for three days. He had carried with him some dried meat, placed between the saddle and the horse's back, to soften it and keep it warm. This had given out long since, but a greater handicap was the lagging horse. The Taidjuts, being able to change from one animal to another, had kept beyond his sight.

After the fourth sunrise the young Mongol encountered a warrior of his own age milking a mare beside the trail.

"Hast thou seen eight horses and some men driving them?" Temujin asked, reining in.

"Yea, before dawn eight driven horses went past me. I will show thee the trail they took."

After a second glance at the Mongol, the strange youth hid his leather sack in some tall grass after tying it up. "Thou art tired and anxious," said he. "My name is Borchu and I will ride with thee after the horses."

The tired sorrel was turned out to graze and Borchu roped and saddled a white horse from the herd he was tending, offering it to Temujin. They took up the trail again, and came three days later within sight of the Taidjuts' camp, with the stolen horses grazing near by.

These the two youths drove off, and were promptly followed by the warriors, one of whom mounted on a white stallion and armed with a lariat began to overtake them.

Borchu offered to take Temujin's bow and hang back to meet the pursuers, but Temujin would have none of this. They drove on the horses until daylight began to fail, and the warrior on the white stallion was almost near enough to use his rope.

"These men might wound thee," the young Mongol said to his new comrade, "and I will use the bow."

Dropping behind, he fitted an arrow to the string and loosed it at the Taidjut who fell from the saddle, and the others drew rein when they came up with him. The two youths hurried on through the night and came in safety to the camp of Borchu's father, with the horses and the story of their exploit—Borchu hastening to find and fetch in the sack of milk to temper his father's anger.

"When I saw him weary and anxious," he explained, "I went with him."

The father, master of a large herd, listened with some satisfaction—for the tales of Temujin's adventures had passed from tent to tent over the prairies. "Ye are young," said he, "be ye friends and be ye faithful."

They gave the young khan food, filled a bag with mare's milk and sent him on his way—Borchu following not long after, with a gift of black fur for the family and the chieftain he had taken to himself.

"Without thee," Temujin greeted him, "I could not have found and brought back these horses, so half of the eight are thine."

But to this Borchu would not agree. "If I should take what is thine from thee, how couldst thou call me comrade?"

Neither Temujin nor his youthful braves were niggards. Generosity was deep seated in him, and his memory for those who served him unfailing. As for those who warred against him—every one outside his little band was a potential enemy.

"As a merchant trusts in his stuffs for profit," he assured his comrades, "the Mongol puts his only hope of fortune in his bravery."

In him were revealed the virtues and cruelties of that other nomad race, the Arabs. For weak characters he had little use, and he was suspicious of everything outside his clan. He had learned to match his cunning against the deceit of his enemies, but his word, when pledged to one of his own following, was inviolate.

"Word breaking," he said in after years, "is hideous in a ruler."

Even in his clan, which was now increasing by the return of warriors who had followed his father, his leadership rested on nothing more substantial than his own skill in evading his enemies and holding by hook and crook the all important pasture lands for his followers. Their herds and weapons, by tribal custom, belonged to themselves, not to the khan. The son of Yesukai might claim their allegiance only so long as he could protect them. Tradition —the law of the tribes—permitted the men of the clan to select another leader if Temujin should prove lacking in the ceaseless and merciless warfare of the nomad lands.

Cunning kept Temujin alive, and a growing wisdom kept the nucleus of a clan about him. Physical prowess he had, and watchfulness. The chieftains who raided into the fertile region between the Kerulon and Onon could drive him from the hills into the lower plain but could not bring him to bay.

"Temujin and his brothers," it was said, "are growing in strength."

Only in Temujin did a spark of unquenchable purpose glow. He would be master of his heritage. At this time, when he was seventeen, he went to look for Bourtai, to carry off his first wife.

CHAPTER III

THE BATTLE OF THE CARTS

AMONG THE BOW-AND-ARROW PEOPLE, the denizens of the land of long days and of the high, white mountains—as the ancient Chinese were wont to describe the northern barbarians—there existed an inclination to good humor, an impulse of laughter. Because life was a thing of such incessant toil, and the elements unfriendly, and suffering a constant condition, any alleviation of hardships gave occasion to merry-making. One cannot contemplate Temujin and his Mongols without realizing that they relished a joke; their good humor was sometimes as overbearing as their cruelty. Their feasts were gargantuan affairs.

Marriage and burial offered a rare occasion for ikhüdür, for festival. Such a relaxation of the wolflike antagonism was Temujin's arrival at the tent village of the father of Bourtai—several hundred youths riding up unexpectedly, fully armed and accoutered in sheepskins, loose tanned leather jackets and hideously painted lacquered breastplates, water sacks on the cruppers of their high saddles, lances hung across their shoulders—dusty and grimy over the coating of grease that protected bony faces from the cold bite of the wind.

"When I heard of the great enmity against thee," the father of Bourtai greeted the young khan, "we did not look to see thee thus alive."

A rare scene of laughter, and impetuous good cheer, Servants scurrying about to kill and dress sheep and fat horses for the pot, the Mongol warriors—having left their weapons at the yurt entrances—sitting on the right hand of the elders of the tents, drinking and clapping their hands. Before every potation, a servant hastening out to pour a libation to the quarters of the four winds, and the one-stringed fiddles striking up.

A vista of weather-stained riders out of the plains, pulling the ears of their comrades as if to stretch wider their throats for the fermented milk and rice wine to go down the easier, and dancing clumsily in their deerskin boots.

In the tent of the chieftain, on the third day, Bourtai, sitting on the left hand, arrayed in a long dress of white felt, the braids of her hair heavy with silver coins and tiny statues, her headdress—a cone of birch bark covered with treasured silk and supported over either ear by the whorls of braided hair—becomingly silent, until the time of her taking off, when she fled through the other tents and Temujin must needs pursue her, going through the ceremony of a struggle with her sisters and hand-maids, and finally bearing her off to his horse.

A brief ikhüdür this, of the small nosed beauty who departed from her tent village, astride one of Temujin's ponies. She had awaited his coming four years and she was now thirteen years of age.

So she rode, bound around the waist and breast with blue girdles, her servants bearing with them a sable cloak to be presented to Temujin's mother. She was now the wife of the khan, bound to care for his yurt, to milk—if need be—the animals, to watch the herds when the men were off at war, to make felt for the tents, to sew garments with split sinews, to make sandals and socks for the men.

Thus her duties. And indeed she was singled out for a destiny above that of other women. History knows her as Bourtai Fidjen, the Empress, mother of three sons who ruled in a later day a dominion greater than Rome's.

The sable cloak also had its destiny. Temujin now thought the time auspicious to visit Toghrul of the Karaïts. He took with him his young heroes and the sable cloak for a gift.

Toghrul Khan appears to have been a man of integrity and a lover of peace. If not a Christian himself, his clans were made up largely of Nestorian Christians who had received their faith from the early apostles of Saints Andrew and Thomas. They held the river lands where the city of Urga is now situated. Being largely of Turkish race they were more given to trade and its attendant luxuries than the Mongols.

Genghis Khan presented with gifts

Temujin in this first visit to the court of—as we may call him—his foster father did not ask for aid from the powerful Karaïts and it was Toghrul who reminded him before he rode away of the tie between them.

But before long Temujin invoked the friendship of the old khan. The feuds of the Gobi blazed up anew. Unexpectedly, a formidable clan came down from the nothern plain and raided the Mongol camp. These were the Merkits or Merguen, true barbarians descended from the aboriginal stock of the tundra region—people from the "frozen white world," where men traveled in sledges drawn by dogs and reindeer.

Dour fighters by all accounts, and clansmen of the warrior from whom Houlun had been stolen by Temujin's father some eighteen years ago. Most probably they had not forgotten their old grievance. They came at night, casting blazing torches into the ordu of the young khan.

Temujin was able to get to a horse and clear a way to safety with his arrows, but Bourtai fell to the raiders. To satisfy tribal justice they gave her to a kinsman of the man who had lost Houlun.

The northern warrior did not long enjoy the possession of the Mongol's bride. Temujin, lacking men to launch an attack upon the Merkits, went to his foster father Toghrul and besought the aid of the Karaïts. His request was readily granted and Mongol and Karaït descended upon the village of the raiders during a moonlight night.

The scene is described in the chronicle—Temujin riding among the disordered tents, crying the name of his lost bride—Bourtai, hearing his voice, running forth to seize his rein and be recognized.

"I have found that which I sought," the young Mongol called to his companions, dismounting from his horse.

Although he could never be certain if Bourtai's first-born were his son, his devotion to her is unmistakable. He made no distinction among his sons by her. He had other children, but these were his cherished companions. Other women and their children are no more than vague names in the chronicle.

More than once Bourtai's intuition penetrated plots against his life. We discover her at dawn, kneeling beside his bed and weeping.

"If thine enemies destroy thy heroes, majestic as cedars, what will become of thy small, weak children?"

There was no truce in the struggle of the desert clans. The Mongols were still the weakest of the nomads who ranged the barrens beyond the great wall. The protection of Toghrul made him safe for some years from the western-most rings of tribes, but the Taidjuts and Buyar Lake Tatars[1] harried him on the east with all the bitterness of old enmity. Only a body of exceeding strength and a wolf's instinct for scenting out danger kept the khan alive.

Once he was left for dead in the snow, wounded by an arrow in the throat, and two comrades discovering him sucked the blood from his wound, melting snow in a pot to wash out his hurts. The devotion of these warriors was no lip service—they stole food from an enemy camp when he lay ill, and again, when a blizzard arose on the plain, held a leather cloak as a shelter over him while he slept.

While visiting the yurt of an khan supposedly friendly, he discovered that a pit had been dug under an innocent-seeming carpet upon which he had been invited to sit. Temujin was soon called upon to extricate his whole clan from as bad a dilemma.

The Mongols, now grown to the strength of thirteen thousand warriors, were en route from summer to winter pastures. They were scattered down a long valley, their covered wagons, the kibitkas or tent carts, trundling along within the slow moving herds, when word was brought to the khan that a horde of foemen had appeared on the sky-line and was moving swiftly down upon him.

No heir-apparent of Europe ever faced a similar situation.

The enemy materialized into thirty thousand Taidjuts led by Targoutai. To flee meant the sacrifice of women, cattle and all the clan's possessions; to muster his fighting

[1] The Tatars were a separate clan. Early Europeans by mistake applied the name Tatars to the Mongols, and "Tatary" to the empire of the Mongol Khans. The origin of the word is Chinese—T'a T'a or T'a tzi, the Far though the Tatars on their own account may have adopted the name of an early chieftain Tatur.

bands and ride out to meet the Taidjuts would lead inevitably to his being surrounded by greater numbers, his men cut down or scattered.

It was a crisis of nomad life in which the clan faced destruction, and it called for instant decision, and action by the khan.

Promptly and in a fashion all his own Temujin met the crisis. By now all his warriors were mounted and gathering under the various standards. Drawing them up in line of squadrons with one flank protected by a wood, he formed upon the other flank a large hollow square of the kibitkas. The cattle he drove into this square, and into the carts he hurried the women and the boys who were armed with bows.

He now prepared to face the charge of the thirty thousand who were crossing the valley. They were in full array, drawn up in squadrons of five hundred. The squadrons had a hundred men in a rank and were in consequence five ranks deep.

The first two lines wore armor—heavy plates of iron, pierced and knotted together with thongs, and helmets of iron or hard, lacquered leather surmounted with horsehair crests. The horses, too, were barded—their necks, chests and flanks covered with leather. Their riders bore small, round shields and lances with horsehair tufts beneath the points.

But these ranks of armored riders halted while the rearmost lines passed through them—men wearing only tanned leather and armed with javelins and bows. These, on nimble horses, wheeled in front of the Mongols launching their weapon and screening the advance of the heavy cavalry.

Temujin's men, armed and equipped in like manner, met the onset with flights of arrows, driven from powerful bows strengthened with horn.

This skirmishing ceased when the Taidjut light cavalry wheeled back into position behind the armored ranks and the massed squadrons advanced at a gallop.

Then Temujin loosed his Mongols to meet them. But he had drawn up his clans in double squadrons, in masses of a thousand, ten deep. Though he had only thirteen units and the Taidjuts sixty bands, the charge of his deeper formations along that narrow front checked the Taidjut advance and scattered the leading squadrons.

Temujin was now able to throw his heavy masses against the lighter squadrons of his foe. The Mongols, separating and whirling as they went forward following the standard of the nine yak-tails, loosed their arrows on either hand.

There ensued one of the terrible steppe struggles—mounted hordes, screaming with rage, closing in under arrow flights, wielding short sabers, pulling their foes from the saddle with thrown lariats and hooks attached to the ends of lances. Each squadron fought as a separate command, and the fighting ranged up and down the valley as the warriors scattered under a charge, reformed and came on again.

It lasted until daylight left the sky. Temujin had won a decisive victory. Five or six thousand of the enemy had fallen and seventy chiefs were led before him with swords and quivers hanging from their necks.

Some accounts have it that the Mongol khan caused the seventy to be boiled alive in caldrons on the spot—an improbable touch of cruelty. The young khan had little mercy in him, but knew the value of able-bodied captives to serve him.

CHAPTER IV

TEMUJIN AND THE TORRENTS

THE RED-HAIRED KHAN of the Mongols had fought his first pitched battle and won it. He could now carry with pride the ivory or horn baton, shaped like a small mace, that belonged by right to a general—a leader of men.

And he was obsessed by a hunger for men to serve him. No doubt this hunger had its source in the misery of the lean years when Borchu had pitied him, and the arrows of thick-headed Kassar had saved his life.

But Temujin measured strength not in terms of political power, upon which he had pondered little as yet, or of wealth which seemed to be of scant use. Being a Mongol, he wanted only what he needed. His conception of strength was man-power. When he praised his heroes he said that they had crushed hard stones into gravel, overturned cliffs and stopped the rush of deep waters.

Above everything, he looked for loyalty. Treachery was the unpardonable sin of the clansman. A traitor might bring about the destruction of a whole tent village, or lead a horde into ambush. Loyalty to the clan—and the khan, be it said—was the ultimum desideratum. "What shall be said of a man who will make a promise at dawn and break it at night-fall?"

An echo of his longing for men is heard in his prayer. The Mongol was accustomed to go to the summit of a bare mountain which he believed to be the abiding place of the tengri, the spirits of the upper air that loosed the whirlwinds and thunder and all the awe-inspiring phenomena of the boundless sky. He prayed to the quarters of the four winds, his girdle over his shoulders.

"Illimitable Heaven, do Thou favor me; send the spirits of the upper air to befriend me; but on earth send men to aid me."

And men flocked to the standard of the nine yak-tails in great numbers, no longer by families and tens but by hundreds. A wandering clan, at feud with its former khan, gravely discussed the merits of Temujin of the Mongols —"He permits the hunter to keep all game slain in the great hunts; after a battle each man keeps his just share of spoil. He has taken the coat from his back and given it as a present; he has come down from the horse he had mounted, and has given it to the needy."

No collector ever welcomed a rare acquisition as eagerly as the Mongol khan hailed these wanderers.

He was gathering about him a court, without chamberlains or councilors, made up of warlike spirits. Borchu and Kassar were there, of course—his first brothers-in-arms—and Arghun the lute player, Bayan and Muhuli—two crafty and battle-scarred generals—and Soo, the great crossbowman.

Arghun appears to have been a genial spirit, if not a minstrel. We have one clear glimpse of him when he borrowed a favorite gold lute of the khan and lost it. The quick tempered Mongol fell into a rage and sent two of his paladins to slay Arghun. Instead of doing so they seized the offender and made him drink two skinsful of wine. Then they hid him away. On the following day they roused him out of torpor and led him to the yurt entrance of the khan at daybreak, exclaiming, "The light already shines in thine ordu,[1] O Khan. Open the entrance and display thy clemency."

Seizing this moment of silence, Arghun sang:

"While the thrust sings ting-tang
The hawk pounces on him before the last note—
So did the wrath of my lord fall on me,
Alas, I love the flowing bowl, but am no thief!"

Though theft was punishable by death, Arghun was pardoned, and the fate of the golden lute remains a mystery to this day.

[1]Ordu, the center of the clan, the tent village.

These paladins of the khan were known throughout the Gobi as the Kiyat, or Raging Torrents. Two of them, mere boys at this time, carried devastation over ninety degrees of longitude in a later day—Chepé Noyon, the Arrow Prince, and Subotai Bahadur, the Valiant.

Chepé Noyon appears on the scene as the youth of a hostile clan, hunted after a battle until he was surrounded by Mongols led by Temujin. He had no horse and he asked for one, offering to fight any man among the Mongols. Temujin granted his request, giving the youthful Chepé a swift white-nosed horse. When he had mounted, Chepé managed to cut his way through the Mongols and escape. Later he returned and said that he wished to serve the khan.

Long afterward when Chepé Noyon was ranging through the T'ian shan, hunting down Gutchluk of Black Cathay, he gathered together a drove of a thousand white-nosed horses and sent it to the khan as a gift and a token that he had not forgotten the incident that spared his life.

Less impetuous than young Chepé but more sagacious was Subotai of the Uriankhi, the reindeer people. In him existed something of Temujin's grimness of purpose. Before an engagement with the Tatars, the khan called for an officer to lead the first onset. Subotai came forward and was praised for his action and asked to select a hundred picked warriors to serve as a body guard.

Subotai replied that he wanted no one to accompany him. He intended to go alone, in advance of the horde.

Temujin, doubting, gave him permission to depart, and Subotai rode into the camp of the Tatars with the explanation that he had forsaken the khan and wished to join their clan. He convinced them that the Mongol horde was not in the vicinity, and they were utterly unprepared when the Mongols descended upon them and scattered them.

"I will ward off thy foes," Subotai promised the young khan, "as felt protects from the wind. That is what I will do for thee."

"When we capture beautiful women and splendid stallions," his paladins assured him, "we will bring all to thee.

If we transgress thy commands or work harm to thee, leav us out in the wild barren places to perish."

"I was like a sleeping man when ye came to me, Temujin made answer to his heroes, "I was sitting in sad ness aforetime and ye roused me."

They hailed him for what he was in reality, khan of th Yakka Mongols, and he apportioned to each of the pala dins praise and honors, taking into account the characte of each man.

Borchu, he said, would sit nearest him in the kurulta
the assemblage of the chieftains, and would be among th number that had the right of carrying the khan's bow an quiver. Others were to to be masters of nourishment, havin charge of the herds. Still others were masters of the kibitkas and of the servants. Kassar, who possessed physical strengt and not too much discrimination, he named swordbearer

Temujin was careful to single out discerning men as wel as daring for his lieutenants—the leaders of the armed horde. He knew the value of the cunning that could bridl anger and wait for the proper moment to strike a blow Indeed, the very essence of the Mongol character is it patience. The men who were brave and foolhardy he al lowed to look after the kibitkas, and the all-importan supplies. The stupid were left to tend herd.

Of one leader he said: "No man is more valiant than Yessoutai; no one has rarer gifts. But, as the longes marches do not tire him, as he feels neither hunger no thirst, he believes that his officers and soldiers do not suffe from such things. That is why he is not fitted for high command. A general should think of hunger and thirst so he may understand the suffering of those under him and he should husband the strength of his men and beasts."

To keep his authority over this court of "venomous fighters" the young khan needed all his grim determination and a nicely balanced sense of justice. The chieftains who came to his standard were as unruly as Vikings. The chronicle relates how Bourtai's father appeared with his followers and his seven grown sons to present to the khan.
Gifts were exchanged, and the seven sons took their place among the Mongols, stirring up no end of bitterness—especially one who was a shaman, Tebtengri by name.

Being a shaman, he was supposed to be able to leave his body at will and enter the spirit world. His was the gift of prophecy.

And in Tebtengri there was fierce ambition. After spending some days in the different tents of the chieftains, he and some of his brothers set upon Kassar and beat him with fists and sticks.

Kassar complained to the khan, Temujin.

"Thou who hast boasted," replied his brother, "that no man is thine equal in strength or cunning—why let these fellows beat thee?"

Vexed by this, Kassar went off to his own quarters in the ordu and kept away from Temujin. In this interval, Tebtengri sought out the khan. "My spirit hath listened to words in the other world," he said, "and this truth is known to me from Heaven itself. Temujin will rule his people for a while, but then Kassar will rule. If thou put not an end to Kassar thy rule will not long endure."

The cunning of the priest-conjurer had its effect on the khan who could not forget what he took to be a prophecy. That evening he mounted his horse and went with a small following of warriors to seize Kassar. Word of this reached Houlun, his mother. She ordered her servants to make ready a cart drawn by a swift-paced camel, and hastened after the khan.

She reached Kassar's tents and passed through the warriors who had surrounded them. Entering the chief yurt she found Temujin facing Kassar who was on his knees with his cap and girdle taken from him. The khan was angry, and the fear of death had come to his younger brother, the Bowman.

Houlun, a woman of resolution, undid Kassar's bonds and brought him his cap and girdle. Kneeling, she bared her breasts, and spoke to Temujin. "Ye two have drunk from these breasts. Temujin, thou hast many gifts, but Kassar alone has the strength and skill to shoot arrows without failing. When men have rebelled against thee, he has brought them down with his arrows."

The young khan listened in silence, waiting until the anger of his mother had ceased. Then he left the yurt saying, "I was frightened when I acted thus. Now I am ashamed."

Tebtengri continued to circulate through the tents a stir up trouble. Claiming supernatural revelations as spo sors of his plots, he was a good deal of a thorn in the si of the Mongol khan. He gathered quite a following, a being an ambitious soul, believed that he could undermi the influence of the young warrior. Fearing to come in conflict with Temujin, he and his companions sought o Temugu, the youngest brother of the khan, and forced h to kneel to them.

Tradition forbade the use of weapons in deciding qua rels among the Mongols, but after this act of the shama Temujin sent for Temugu and spoke to him. "This d Tebtengri will come to my yurt. Deal with him as pleas thee."

His position was no easy one. Munlik, chieftain of clan and father of Bourtai, had aided him in many a w and had been honored accordingly. Tebtengri himself w a shaman, a prophet and a wizard. Temujin, the khan, w expected to play the part of judge in dealing with quarr —not to indulge his own wishes.

He was alone in the tent, sitting by the fire when Munl entered with his seven sons. He greeted them, and th seated themselves on his right, when Temugu entered. A weapons, of course, had been left at the yurt entrance, a the youngster caught Tebtengri by the shoulders. "Yeste day I was forced to kneel to thee, but to-day I will t strength with thee."

For a while they struggled and the other sons of Munl rose to their feet.

"Wrestle not here!" Temujin called to the two adve saries. "Go outside."

By the entrance of the yurt three strong wrestlers we waiting—had been waiting for this moment, whether i structed by Temugu or the khan. They seized Tebteng as he came forth, broke his spine and threw him asid Without moving, he lay near the wheel of a cart.

"Tebtengri forced me to my knees yesterday," Temug cried to his brother the khan. "Now, when I wish to t strength with him, he lies down and will not rise."

Munlik and his six sons went to the door, looked ou and saw the body of the shaman. Then grief troubled th ld chieftain and he turned to Temujin. "O Khan, I have erved thee, until this day!"

His meaning was clear, and his six sons made ready to ush upon the Mongol. Temujin stood up. He had no wea- on and there was no way out of the yurt except the en- rance. Instead of calling for aid he spoke sternly to the ngry clansmen. "Aside! I wish to go out!"

Surprised by the unexpected command, they gave way, nd he went from the tent to the guard post of his war- iors. So far the affair had been only an incident in the ever-ending feuds around the red-headed khan. But he vished to avoid, if possible, a blood feud with Munlik's lan. A glance at the body of the shaman told him that Tebtengri was dead. He ordered his own yurt to be moved, o it covered the body, and the entrance flap was tied shut.

During the next night Temujin sent two of his men to ift the body of the priest conjurer through the smoke hole t the top of the tent. When curiosity began to be aroused mong the men of the ordu as to the fate of the wizard, Temujin opened the entrance flap and enlightened them.

"Tebtengri made plots against my brothers and struck hem, and now the spirits of Heaven have taken away both is life and his body."

But to Munlik when they were alone together again he poke gravely. "Thou didst not teach thy sons obedience, hough they had need of it. This one tried to make himself ny equal, and so I put an end to him, as I have to others. As for thee, I have promised to spare thee from death in very case. So let us end this matter."[2]

There was no end, however, to the tribal warfare of the Gobi, to the wolf-like struggle of the great clans—the arrying and the hunting down. Though the Mongols were till one of the weaker peoples, a hundred thousand tents ow followed the standard of the khan. His cunning pro- ected them, his fierce courage emboldened his warriors. nstead of a few families, the responsibility of a people ested upon his shoulders. He himself could sleep sound

[2]The Mongol saga of Ssanang Setzen is rather allegorical, and gives the impression hat the events in the Gobi were caused by the prowess, the cunning or the treachery f a few men. In reality the conspiracy of the shaman lasted a long time and volved strong parties on both sides. It was as important in its way as the combat etween church and king that marked the reign of Frederick II and Innocent IV Europe not long after.

of nights; his herds, increased by the khan's tithe, gre comfortably. He was more than thirty years of age, in t fullness of his strength, and his sons now rode with hi looking about for wives, as he had once traveled the plai at Yesukai's side. He had gleaned his heritage from h enemies, and he meant to hold it.

But there was something else in his mind, a plan ha formed, a wish half expressed.

"Our elders have always told us," he said one day b fore the council, "that different hearts and minds cann be in one body. But this I intend to bring about. I sha extend my authority over my neighbors."

To mold the "venomous fighters" into one confederac of clans, to make his feudal enemies his subjects. That wa his thought. And he set about realizing it with all h really great patience.

CHAPTER V

WHEN THE STANDARD STOOD ON GUPTA

WITH THE WARS of the nomad clans—Tatars and Mongols, Merkits and Karaïts, Naimans and Ugurs that passed and repassed across the high prairies from the great wall of Cathay to the far mountains of mid Asia in the west—we are not here concerned. The twelfth century was drawing to its end, and Temujin was still laboring at what his elders told him could not be brought about, a confederacy of the clans. It could only come in one way, by the supremacy of one clan over the others.

The Karaïts, in their cities on the caravan route from the northern gates of Cathay to the west, held what might be called the balance of power. To Toghrul, called Prester John, went Temujin with the suggestion of an alliance. The Mongols were strong enough now for him to do so fittingly.

"Without thy assistance, O my father, I cannot survive unmolested. Thou, too, canst not live on in peace without my firm friendship. Thy false brothers and cousins would invade thy land and divide thy pastures between them. Thy son hath not wisdom to see this at present, but he would be reft of power and life if thine enemies prevail. Our one way to keep our authority and survive is through a friendship nothing can shatter. Were I thy son also, matters would be settled for both of us."

It was Temujin's right to claim adoption by the elder khan, and Prester John gave assent. He was old, and he had a liking for the young Mongol.

To his compact Temujin remained faithful. When the Karaïts were driven out of their lands and cities by the western tribes which were largely Muhammadans and Buddhists and cherished a warm religious hatred of the Christian-shamanistic Karaïts, the Mongol sent his Raging Torrents to aid the discomfited chieftain.

And, tentatively—as the ally of the old Karaït—he essayed statecraft.

The opportunity was an excellent one, to his thinking. Behind the great wall the Golden Emperor of Cathay[1] stirred in his sleep and remembered inroads of the Buyan Lake Tatars that had annoyed his frontiers. He announced that he himself would lead a grand expedition beyond the wall to punish the offending tribesmen—an announcement that filled his subjects with alarm. Eventually a high officer was dispatched with a Cathayan army against the Tatars, who retired as usual unscathed and unchastened. The host of Cathay, being composed largely of foot soldiers, could not come up with the nomads.

Tidings of this reached Temujin, who acted as swiftly as hard whipped ponies could bear his messages across the plains. He rallied all his clansmen and sent to Prester John, reminding his elder ally that the Tatars were the clan that had slain his father. The Karaïts answered his call, and the combined hordes rode down upon the Tatars who could not retreat because the Cathayans were in their rear.

The ensuing battle broke the power of the Tatars, added numbers of captives to the victorious clans, and gave the officer of the expeditionary force of Cathay an opportunity to claim all credit for himself, which he did. He rewarded Prester John with the title of Wang Khan, or Lord of Kings, and Temujin with the brevet of "Commander Against Rebels"—an emolument that cost the Cathayan nothing at all, except a silver cradle covered with cloth of gold. Both title and gift must have astonished the hard-fighting Mongol rarely. At any rate the cradle, the first ever seen in the barrens, was put on view in the tent of the khan.

New warriors joined the ranks of the Raging Torrents.

[1] Thirteenth century China, which was then divided between the Chin, or Gold dynasty in the north and the older Sung dynasty in the south. Cathay itself is derived from Khitai, the Tatar word for China and the dynasty that had given way to the Chin. In middle Asia and Russia to-day China is still called Khitai. The early voyagers out of Europe brought the name back with them.

Eastern Asia, at the end of the twelfth century.
I. The Chin Empire; II. The Empire of the Sung; III. The Kingdom of Hia; IV. The Empire of Black Cathay.

Temujin could watch his sons go forth with Chepé Noyon, the Arrow Lord, who had a weakness for wearing sable boots and silvered mail that he had plundered from a wandering Cathayan. Chepé Noyon was never satisfied unless he was afield with a band of partisans to gallop after him. A good tutor for the eldest son Juchi—the Guest—born under a shadow, and moody and defiant, and yet bold enough in spirit to delight the khan.

It was the last of the twelfth century; Temujin had led his household people on a hunt down the rivers toward the Karaït land, flinging wide the circle of riders. They had driven a good number of antelope, some deer and lesser game, and closed the circle, making play with stout curved bows until the last living creature lay among the bowlders. No dallying about a Mongol hunt.

The covered kibitkas and the camel carts awaited them, off somewhere in the prairie and, the hunters returning, the oxen were unspanned. The wattles of the yurts were set up and the felt covering drawn taut over the framework. Fires lighted.

Much of the game was to be kept as a gift for old Toghrul, now Wang Khan. The Karaïts had been overbearing to the Mongols. Spoil, rightly belonging to Temujin's men, had been taken by the men of Wang Khan, and the Mongol had suffered this.

He had too many enemies in the lands of the Karaïts, descendants of the Bourchikoun who wished to oust him from the khanship and the favor of the Karaït lord. So he was going to his foster father. It had been agreed between them that if any difference arose, one would not act against the other, but would meet together and talk quietly until the truth of the matter was clear to them.

Temujin had learned much from bitter experience. On the death of Wang Khan he knew there would be war anew; but among the Karaïts were groups of warriors who favored him. The bodyguard of Wang Khan, urged by the enemies of the Mongol khan to seize him, had refused. And offers of marriage had been sent to the Mongols. The Karaïts had a bride for Juchi among the girls of the chieftain's family.

But Temujin remained in his camp, keeping his distance warily from the Karaït ordus, while his men went before him to see if the way were safe. His riders did not return, but two horse-herds galloped in at night with news of the Karaïts. News both unwelcome and ominous.

His enemies in the west—Chamuka the Cunning, Toukta Beg, chieftain of the dour Merkits, the son of Wang Khan and Temujin's uncles—had determined to put an end to him. They had chosen Chamuka as gurkhan. They had persuaded the aging and hesitant Wang Khan to throw his strength with theirs. The marriage overture had been a ruse—as Temujin half suspected.

His efforts at statecraft had failed. He had been working, it seems, to keep the Karaïts at war with the western Turkish tribes while he strengthened himself in the east; and to keep Wang Khan allied to him until his eastern clans were strong enough to face the Karaïts on an equal footing. His policy had been judicious, but his guile had been met by greater cunning, and now by treachery.

The Karaïts—so the two herdsmen told him—were drawing near his camp, intending to rush upon it during the night and slay him in his tent with arrows.

The situation was nearly desperate, since the Karaïts would be in greater force, and Temujin had the families of his warriors to preserve if possible. Of armed men he had six thousand—some accounts place the number at less than three thousand. He had been warned and he lost not a minute in acting.

He sent the guards of his own yurt through the encampment, rousing the sleepers, warning the leaders, and routing out the herd boys. The herds were driven off, to be stampeded before daylight and scattered as much as possible. No way to save them, more than that. The people of the ordu hastened to mount the horses that were always kept at hand, and to fill the lighter camel carts with their chests and women. Without wailing or any argument began the long trek back to their encampments.

The yurts and the great ox-carts he left standing as they were, and detached a few men with good horses to keep the fires burning high. With his officers and the best of his clansmen he retired slowly, covering the retreat. No chance, now, to escape the storm that was drawing near under the screen of darkness.

They rode eight or nine miles toward a mass of hills that would offer some shelter to his men if they were forced to scatter. After crossing a stream, he halted his riders within a gorge, before the horses should become weary.

Meanwhile the Karaïts had swept into his deserted camp before daybreak and had pierced through with their arrows the white felt tent of the khan before they noticed the silence of the place, the absence of the herds and the standard. They had then an interval of confusion and consultation. The bright fires had led them to think the Mongols were still within the yurts. And when they understood the tents had been left, with carpets and utensils—even the spare saddles and milk sacks—it seemed to them that the Mongols had fled from them in fear and without order.

The broad trail to the east could not be hidden by darkness, and the clans of the Karaïts took up the pursuit at once. They went at a gallop, and they arrived at the foothills after dawn, with the dust clouds rolling up behind them. Temujin watched their approach, and saw that they had stretched out in the swift ride. The clans were scattered, the best horses forging ahead of the slower-paced.

Instead of waiting longer in the gorge he led out his warriors in close array, their horses rested. They crossed the stream and scattered the vanguard of the Karaïts, and formed across the rolling grassland, covering the retreat of the ordu. Then Wang Khan and his chieftains came up. The Karaïts were realigned, and the desperate battle of extermination began.

Temujin had never been harder pressed. He had need then of all the personal valor of his Raging Torrents, and the steadiness of his household clans, the heavily armed riders of the Urut and Manhut clans that had always served him. His numbers did not allow him to make a frontal attack and he was reduced to holding what little advantage the ground gave him—which meant a last resort with Mongols. As the day drew to its close, with inevitable defeat in store for him, he called upon one of his sworn brothers, Guïldar the standard keeper, chieftain of the Manhuts, and ordered him to circle the array of the Karaïts and take and keep a hill on their left rear, a hill known as Gupta.

"O Khan, my brother," responded the weary Guïldar, "I will mount my best horse and break through all who oppose me. I will plant thy yak-tailed standard on Gupta. I will show thee my valor, and if I fall, do thou nourish and rear my children. It is all one to me when my end comes."

This circling movement was the favorite maneuver of the Mongols, the tulughma, or "standard sweep" that turns an enemy's flank and takes him in the rear. With his clans shattered and the Karaïts breaking through his lines, and darkness coming on, it was now no more than a desperate effort of defiance; but the stalwart Guïldar did reach the hill and plant his standard, and hold his ground. It held the Karaïts in restraint, especially as the son of Wang Khan had been wounded in the face with an arrow.

When the sun set, the Karaïts and not the Mongols, withdrew a little from the field. Temujin waited only to cover Guïldar's withdrawal, and to gather up the wounded paladins—two of his sons among them—who rode in on captured horses, sometimes two men on a single animal. Then he fled to the east, and the Karaïts took up the pursuit the next day.

It had been the most desperate of Temujin's battles, and he had been defeated. But he had kept the nucleus of his clansmen intact, himself alive and the ordu safeguarded.

"We have fought," said Wang Khan, "a man with whom we should never have quarreled."

In Mongol legend it is still repeated how Guïldar bore the standard to Gupta.

But on the long retreat, such was the necessity of life in the barrens, the warriors "licking their wounds" on their spent horses flung out again the circle of hunters to gather in antelope and deer—whatever they could reach with their arrows. No love of sport impelled them to do this. Food must be gleaned for the ordu.

CHAPTER VI

PRESTER JOHN DIES

THE IMMEDIATE EFFECT of the Karaït victory was to strengthen the alliance against Temujin. Chieftains of the nomads were well inclined to ally themselves with a growing power; it meant protection and greater wealth for them.

To Wang Khan the angry Mongol sent eloquent reproach.

"O Khan, my father, when thou wert pursued by enemies, did I not send my four heroes to aid thee? Thou didst come to me on a blind horse, thy garments in tatters, thy body nourished only by the meat of a single sheep. Did I not give thee abundance of sheep and horses?

"In times gone by, thy men kept the booty of battle that was mine by right. Then it all was lost to thee, taken by thy foes. My heroes restored it. Then, by the Black River we swore we would not listen to the evil words of those who would divide us, but would meet and talk together of the matter. I have not said, 'My reward is slight, I have need of a greater.'

"When a wheel of an ox-cart breaks, the oxen cannot go forward. Am I not a wheel of thy kibitka? Why art thou angered because of me? Why dost thou attack me now?"

In this can be detected an echo of contempt. And the reproach is rather for the wavering man who did not know his own mind—Prester John mounted on a blind horse.

Temujin set about making the best of things with his dogged determination. Couriers were sent to the near-by clans and soon the khans of his own domain and their neighbors were kneeling on either side of the white horse skin of the Mongol chieftain, their feet tucked under them decorously, their long coats bound with ornamented girdles their lined, bronzed faces peering through the smoke of the yurt fire. The concil of the khans.

Each one spoke in turn, the Bourchikoun, the Gray-eyed Men, many of whom had tasted defeat at the hands of Temujin. Some wished to give in to the powerful Karaïts and submit to the overlordship of Prester John and his son. The bolder spirits raised their voices for battle, and offered to give the baton of leadership to Temujin. This counsel prevailed.

Temujin, in accepting the baton, said that his orders must be obeyed in all the clans, and he must be allowed to punish whom he saw fit. "From the beginning I have said to you that the lands between the three rivers must have a master. You would not understand. Now, when you fear that Wang Khan will treat you as he has treated me, you have chosen me for a leader. To you I have given captives, women, yurts and herds. Now I shall keep for you the lands and customs of our ancestors."

During that winter the Gobi became divided into two rival camps, the peoples east of Lake Baïkul arming against the western confederacy. This time Temujin was first in the field, before snow left the valleys. With his new allies he advanced without warning on the camp of Wang Khan.

The chronicle gives an amusing insight into the trickery of the nomads. Temujin had sent a Mongol into the enemy lines to complain of ill-treatment, and to say that the Mongol horde was still far distant from the camp. The Karaïts, not too credulous, dispatched several riders on picked mounts to go back with this warrior and see for themselves the truth of the matter.

Not far from the Karaït camp, the single Mongol warrior who was keeping his eyes about him, beheld the standard bar of Temujin's clans on the other side of a knoll they were climbing. He knew that his captors were well mounted and could gallop clear if they noticed the standard. So he dismounted and busied himself about his horse. When asked what he was doing, he said:

"A stone is in one of the hoofs."

By the time the sagacious Mongol had relieved his horse

Old engraving of Genghis Khan

of the imaginary stone, Temujin's vanguard came over the rise and made the Karaïts prisoners. Wang Khan's camp was attacked and a bitter struggle began.

By nightfall the Karaïts were broken, Wang Khan and his son both wounded and fleeing. Temujin rode into the captured camp, and gave to his men the wealth of the Karaïts, the saddles covered with colored silk and soft, red leather, the thin and finely tempered sabers, the plates and goblets of silver. Such things could not serve him. The tent of Wang Khan, hung with cloth-of-gold, he gave entire to the two herders who had warned him of the Karaït advance that first night near Gupta.

Following up the center of the Karaïts, he surrounded them with his warriors and offered them their lives if they would yield. "Men fighting as ye have done to save your lord, are heroes. Be ye among mine, and serve me."

The remnants of the Karaïts joined his standard, and he pushed forward to their city in the desert, Karakorum, the Black Sands.

His cousin, Chamuka the Cunning, was made captive afterward and brought before him.

"What fate dost thou expect?" Timujin asked.

"The same that I would have bestowed upon thee, had I taken thee!" responded Chamuka without hestitation. "The slow death."

He meant the Chinese torture of slow dismemberment that begins the first day with cutting off the joints of the little fingers and continues up all the limbs. Surely there was no lack of courage among the descendants of the Bourchikoun. Temujin, however, followed the custom of his people, which forbids shedding the blood of a chieftain of high birth, and sent away Chamuka to be strangled with a silk bowstring, or stifled between heavy felts.

Prester John, who had entered the war unwillingly, fled hopelessly beyond his lands and was put to death by two warriors of a Turkish tribe. His skull, the chronicle relates, was set in silver and remained in the tent of this chieftain, an object of veneration. His son was killed in much the same manner.

A nomad chieftain might have been expected to content himself with the fruits of such a victory. And the results of a nomad conquest have ever been the same—a gathering of spoil, idleness or restlessness, then quarrels or a dividing up of the haphazard empire of the wanderers.

Temujin showed himself made of different stuff. He had now a core of a kingdom, in the Karaïts who had cultivated the soil and built cities—of dried mud and thatch, it is true, but still permanent abiding places. Using every effort to keep the Karaïts settled and reconciled, he launched his hordes into new conquests without an instant of delay.

"The merit of an action," he told his sons, "is in finishing it to the end."

In the three years following the battle that gave him the mastery of the Gobi, he thrust his veteran horsemen far into the valleys of the western Turks, the Naimans and Ugurs, people of a superior culture. They had been the foes of Prester John, and might have banded together to resist Temujin, but he gave them no time to realize what was in store for them. From the long white mountains of the north, down the length of the great wall, through the ancient cities of Bishbalik and Khoten his officers galloped.

Marco Polo has a word to say here, of Temujin.

"When he conquered a province he did no harm to the people or their property, but merely established some of his own men in the country among them, while he led the remainder to the conquest of other provinces. And when those whom he had conquered became aware how well and safely he protected them against all others, and how they suffered no ill at his hands, and saw what a noble prince he was, then they joined him heart and soul and became his devoted followers. And when he had thus gathered such a multitude that they seemed to cover the earth, he began to think of conquering a great part of the world."

The fate of his old enemies was hardly as desirable as this. Once he had broken the armed power of a hostile clan, the Mongol hunted down all men of the reigning family and put them to death. The fighting men of the clan were divided up among more dependable people; the most desirable women were taken as wives by his warriors—others were made slaves. Wandering children were adopted by Mongol mothers, and the grazing lands and herds of the defeated clan turned over to new owners.

Temujin's life, up to this point, had been shaped by his enemies. From adversity he had gained strength of body and the wolflike wisdom that seemed to lead him to do instinctively the right thing. Now he was strong enough to make conquests on his own account. And after the first overthrow of the men who faced him with weapons, he proved an indulgent master.

He was entering new parts of the world, the age-old caravan routes and cities of Central Asia, and a vast curiosity stirred in him. He noticed among the captives men richly dressed and upright in bearing, who were not warriors, and he learned that they were savants—astrologers who knew the stars—physicians who understood the use of herbs such as rhubarb and the ailments of sick women.

A certain Ugur who had served a defeated chieftain was brought before him still holding a small gold object curiously wrought.

"Why dost thou cling to that?" the Mongol asked.

"I wished," responded the faithful minister, "to care for it until the death of him who entrusted it to me."

"Thou art a loyal subject," the khan admitted, "but he is dead, and his land, all he possessed, is now mine. Tell me what this token is good for."

"Whenever my lord wished to levy silver or grain, he gave a commission to one of his subjects; it was necessary to mark his orders with this seal to show that they were in reality royal commands."

Temujin promptly ordered a seal to be made for himself, and one was fashioned of green jade. He pardoned the captive Ugur, gave him a position in his court with instructions to teach his children the writing of the Ugurs, which is a form of Syriac taught in all probability by Nestorian priests long since dead.

But to his paladins fell the greatest reward—to those who had aided the khan in some crisis. They were created tar-khans, and raised above all others. They had the right of entering the royal pavilion at any time without ceremony. They could make the first selection of their share of spoil taken in any war, and were exempt from all tithes. More than that, they could do, actually, no wrong. Nine times would the death punishment be forgiven them. Whatever lands they selected, they were to have, and these privileges would be inherited by their children, to nine generations.

In the minds of his nomads, nothing was more desirable than to be one of the fellowship of tar-khans. They were fired by victory, by the rampaging of those three years through new lands, and for the nonce they were held in check by awe of the Mongol khan.

But around the person of the conqueror were gathered the wildest spirits of all Asia, the Turko-Mongol warriors from the sea to the T'ian shan where Gutchluk ruled Black Cathay. For the moment clan feuds were forgotten. Buddhist and shaman, devil-worshiper and Muhammadan, and Nestorian Christian sat down as brothers, awaiting events.

Almost anything could have happened. What did happen was that the Mongol khan rose above the limitations of his ancestors. He called together the kurultai, the council of the khans, to select a single man to rule all the peoples of high Asia. An emperor.

He explained to them that they must choose one of their number to have authority over the others. Naturally enough, after the events of the last three years, the choice of the kurultai fell upon Temujin. More than that, the council decided that he was to have a fitting title. A soothsayer in the gathering now came forward and announced that his new name should be Genghis Kha Khan, the Greatest of Rulers, the Emperor of All Men.

The council was pleased, and at the unanimous insistence of the khans Temujin assumed his new title.

CHAPTER VII

THE YASSA

THE COUNCIL had been held in 1206 and in the same year the official of Cathay, the Warden of the Western Marches, whose duty it was to watch over the barbarians beyond the great wall and collect tribute from them, reported that "absolute quiet prevails in the far kingdoms." Following the selection of Genghis Khan as their master, the Turko-Mongol peoples were united for the first time in several centuries.

In the high tide of their enthusiasm they believed that Temujin, now Genghis Khan, was in reality a bogdo, a sending from the gods, endowed with the power of high Heaven. But no enthusiasm could have held these lawless hordes in restraint. They had lived too long governed by tribal custom. And customs vary as much as the natures of men.

To hold them in check, Genghis Khan had the military organization of his Mongols, most of whom were now veterans. But he announced that he had made the Yassa, to rule them. The Yassa was his code of laws, a combination of his own will and the most expedient of tribal customs.

He made it clear that he disliked particularly theft and adultery, which was to be punished by death. If a horse were stolen the punishment should be death. He said that it angered him to hear of a child disobedient to its parents, of the younger brother to the older; a husband's want of confidence in his wife, a wife's lack of submission to her husband; the failure of the rich to aid the poor and of inferiors to show respect for leaders.

Regarding strong drink, a Mongol failing, he said: "A man who is drunk is like one struck on the head; his wisdom and skill avail him not at all. Get drunk only three times a month. It would be better not to get drunk at all. But who can abstain altogether?"

Another weakness of the Mongols was fear of thunder. During the severe storms of the Gobi this fear had so overmastered them at times that they threw themselves into lakes and rivers to escape the wrath of the skies—at least so the worthy voyager, Fra Rubruquis tells us. The Yassa forbade bathing, or touching water at all during a thunderstorm.

Himself a man of violent rages, Genghis Khan denied his people their most cherished indulgence, violence. The Yassa interdicted quarrels among Mongols. On another point he was inexorable—there should be no other Genghis Kha Khan. His name and the names of his sons were written only in gilt, or were not written at all. Nor would the men of the new emperor willingly speak the name of the Khan.

A deist himself, raised among the ragged and rascally shamans of the Gobi, his code treated matters of religion indulgently. Leaders of other faiths, devotees, the criers of the mosques were to be freed from public charges. Indeed, a motley array of priesthood trailed after the Mongol camps —wandering yellow and red lamas swinging their prayer wheels, some of them wearing "stoles, painted with a likeness of the true Christian devil"—thus Fra Rubruquis. And Marco Polo relates that before a battle Genghis Khan demanded that astrologers take the omens. The "Saracen" soothsayers failed to prophesy effectively, but the Nestorian Christians had better success with two little canes marked with the names of the rival leaders, which fell, one atop the other when lines from the book of Psalms were read aloud. Though Genghis Khan may have listened to the soothsayers—and he listened attentively to the warnings of a Cathayan astrologer in later life—he does not seem to have turned back from any venture on account of them.

The Yassa dealt in simple fashion with spies, sodomites, false witnesses and black sorcerers. They were put to death.

The first law of the Yassa is rather remarkable. "It is ordered that all men should believe in one God, creator of Heaven and earth, the sole giver of goods and poverty, of life and death as pleases Him, whose power over all things is absolute." An echo here of the teachings of the early Nestorians. But this law was never pronounced publicly. Genghis Khan had no wish to make a dividing line among his subjects, or to stir up the always latent embers of doctrinal antagonism.

A psychologist might say that the Yassa aimed at three things—obedience to Genghis Khan, a binding together of the nomad clans, and the merciless punishment of wrong-doing. It concerned itself with men, not property. And a man, by the way, was not to be adjudged guilty—unless caught in the act of crime—if he did not confess. It must be remembered that among the Mongols, an illiterate people, a man's spoken word was a solemn matter.

More often than not a nomad, faced with an accusation of wrong-doing, would admit it if he were guilty. There were instances of some who came in to the Khan and asked to be punished.

In the later years of his life, obedience to the Khan was absolute. The general of a division stationed a thousand miles from the court submitted to be relieved of his command and executed at the order of the Khan brought by a common courier.

"They are obedient to their lords beyond any other people," said the stout Fra Carpini, "giving them vast reverence and never deceiving them in word or action. They seldom quarrel, and brawls, wounds or slaying hardly ever happen. Thieves and robbers are nowhere found, so that their houses and carts in which all their goods and treasure rest are never locked or barred. If any animal of their herds go astray, the finder leaves it or drives it back to the officers who have charge of strays. Among themselves they are courteous and though victuals are scarce, they share them freely. They are very patient under privations, and though they may have fasted for a day or two, will sing and make merry. In journeying they bear cold or heat without complaining. They never fall out and though often drunk, never quarrel in their cups."

(This was a matter, apparently, of some surprise to t voyager out of Europe.)

"Drunkenness is honorable among them. When one h drunk to excess and throws up, he begins again to drin Toward other people they are exceedingly proud and ove bearing, looking upon all other men, however noble, wi contempt. For we saw in the emperor's court the great dul of Russia, the son of the king of Georgia, and many sultai and other great men who had no honor or respect. Indee even the Tatars appointed to attend them, however lo their condition, always went before these high-born captiv and took the upper places.

"They are irritable and disdainful to other men, and b yond belief deceitful. Whatever mischief they intend the carefully conceal, that no one may provide against it. An the slaughter of other people they consider as nothing."

To aid one another—and destroy other people. An ech of the Yassa. These clansmen, war hungry and smartin from ancient feuds, could be held together only in one wa Left to their own devices they would soon have been at the old work of mutual extermination, fighting for spoil an pastureland. The red-haired Kha Khan had sown the win and stood to reap the whirlwind.

He realized this—he must have realized it, judging b his next actions. He had been weaned among the nomad and he knew that the one way to keep them from each oth er's throats was to lead them to war elsewhere. He meant t harness the whirlwind and direct it away from the Gobi.

The chronicle gives us a glimpse of him at this time, be fore the long feasting of the kurultai came to an end. Stand ing at the foot of Deligoun-Bouldak the mountain tha shadowed his homeland, standing beneath the now-familia standard pole with its nine white yak-tails, he addresse the Bourchikoun and the chieftains who had pledged alle giance to him.

"These men who will share with me the good and bad o the future, whose loyalty will be like the clear rock crysta
—I wish them to be called Mongols. Above everything tha breathes on earth I wish them to be raised to power."

He had the imagination to see this assemblage of un bridled spirits united in one horde. The wise and mysteriou

Ugurs, the stalwart Karaïts, the hardy Yakka Mongols, the ferocious Tatars, the dour Merkits—the silent and long-enduring men from the snow tundras, the hunters of game—all the riders of high Asia, gathered into a single gigantic clan, himself the chieftain.

They had been united before, briefly, under the Hiung-nu monarchs who harried Cathay until the great wall was built to shut them out. Genghis Khan had the gift of eloquence to stir deep-seated emotions in them. And he never doubted his ability to lead them.

He held before their eyes the vision of conquest throughout unknown lands, but he exerted himself to the utmost to mobilize this new horde. He invoked the Yassa.

It was forbidden any warrior of the horde to forsake his comrades—the men of his "ten." Or for the others of the "ten" to leave behind them a wounded man. Likewise was it forbidden any of the horde to flee before the standard withdrew from a battle, or to turn aside to pillage before permission was given by the officer commanding.

(The inevitable inclination of the man in the ranks to loot whenever possible was met by the rule that they were entitled to all they found—officers notwithstanding.)

And the observant Fra Carpini is authority that Genghis Khan enforced this portion of the Yassa, for he describes the Mongols as "never leaving the field while the standard was lifted, and never asking quarter if taken, or sparing a living foeman."

The horde itself was no haphazard gathering of clans. Like the Roman legion it had its permanent organization, its units of ten to ten thousand—the tuman that formed a division, needless to say of cavalry. In command of the armies were the Orkhons, the marshals of the Khan, the infallible Subotai, the old and experienced Muhuli, and the fiery Chepé Noyon—eleven in all.

The weapons—at least the lances, heavy armor and shields—of the horde were kept in arsenal by certain officers, cared for and cleaned until the warriors were summoned for a campaign, when they were issued weapons, mustered and inspected by gur-khans. The sagacious Mongol did not intend to have several hundred thousand men loose and fully armed, scattered over a million square miles of plains and mountains.

To divert the energies of his horde, the Yassa ordered t winter—between the first heavy snow and the first grass- to be devoted to hunts on a grand scale, expeditions aft antelope, deer and the fleet-footed wild ass.

In the spring he announced that councils would be hel and all the higher officers expected to attend. "Those wh instead of coming to me to hear my instructions, rema absent in their cantonments, will have the fate of a sto that is dropped into deep water, or an arrow among ree —they will disappear."

No doubt Genghis Khan had learned from ancestral tr dition, and had availed himself of existing customs; but t creation of the horde as a permanent military organizatic was his work. The Yassa ruled it, the lash of inexorab authority held it together. Ghenghis Khan had under h hand a new force in warfare, a disciplined mass of heav cavalry capable of swift movement in all kinds of countr Before his time the ancient Persians and the Parthians ha perhaps as numerous bodies of cavalry, yet they lacked th Mongols' destructive skill with the bow and savage courag

In the horde he had a weapon capable of vast destructio if rightly handled and held in restraint. And he had full determined to wield it against Cathay, the ancient an unchanging empire behind the great wall.

Part Two

CHAPTER VIII

CATHAY

BEYOND THE GREAT WALL things were vastly different than in high Asia. Here existed a civilization of some five thousands years, with written records extending back thirty centuries. And here lived men who spent their lives in contemplation as well as in fighting.

Once the ancestors of these men had been nomads, a horse riding people, adept in the use of the bow. But for three thousand years instead of migrating, they had built cities, and much may be done in that time. They had multiplied enormously, and when men increase and crowd one another they build walls. And they divide themselves into different classes of human beings.

Unlike the Gobi, the men behind the great wall were slaves and peasants—scholars, soldiers, and beggars—mandarins, dukes and princes. Always they had had an emperor, the son of Heaven, T'ien tsi, and a court, the Clouds of Heaven.

In the year 1210, the Year of the Sheep in the Calendar of the Twelve Beasts, the throne was occupied by the Chin or Golden dynasty. The court was at Yen-king, near the site of modern Peking.

Cathay was like an aged woman, sunk in meditation, clad perhaps in too elaborate garments, surrounded by many sleeping children, little heeded. The hours of its rising and sleeping were all ordained; it went forth in chariots, attended by servants, and prayed to the tablets of the dead.

Its garments were of floss silk, many colored—though the slaves might run barefoot and cotton clad. Over the head of its high officials umbrellas were carried. Inside the entrances of its dwellings, screens served to keep out wandering devils. It bowed the head to ritual, and studied how to make its conduct perfect.

Barbarians had come down from the north—the Cathayans themselves, and the Chins, a century ago. They had been absorbed into the great mass of human beings behind the wall. In time they had fallen into the manners of Cathay, clad themselves in its garments and followed its ritual.

Within the cities of Cathay were pleasure lakes, and barges where men could sit with rice wine, listening to the melody of silver bells in a woman's hand. They might, perhaps, drift under a tiled pagoda roof, or hear the summons of a temple gong.

They studied the Bamboo Books written in forgotten ages and discussed together at long-drawn feasts the golden days of T'ang. They were the men of Chin, followers of a dynasty, servants of the sitter on the throne. Tradition ruled them, as it taught them the highest duty was to the dynasty. Even though they might, as in the days of Master K'ung,[1] cry out at the imperial cortège wherein the emperor rode with a courtesan in a carriage before the savant, "Lo, here is lust in front and virtue behind."

Or even a vagabond poet, wrapped in drunken contemplation of the beauty of moonlight upon a river, might fall in the water and be drowned and be no less a poet for all that. The pursuit of perfection is a laborious business, but time did not matter in Cathay.

A painter contented himself with touching silk with a bit of color—a bird on a branch, or a snow-capped mountain. A detail, but a perfect detail. The astrologer in his roof among the brass globes and quadrants, noted down each movement of a star; the minstrel of war was contemplative.

"No sound of a bird now breaks from the hushed walls. Only the wind whistles through the long night, where ghosts of the dead wander in the gloom. The fading moon twinkles on the falling snow. The fosses of the walls are frozen with blood and bodies with beards stiff with ice. Each arrow is spent; every bowstring broken. The strength of the war horse is lost. Thus is the city of Han-li under the hand of the enemy."

[1] Confucius.

Another old engraving of the Khan

So the minstrel, seeing a picture in death itself, voiced the resignation that is the heritage of Cathay.

War engines they had—twenty horse chariots, ancient and useless, but also stone casters, cross-bows that the strength of ten men did not serve to wind—catapults that took two hundred artillerists to draw taut the massive ropes; they had the "Fire that Flies" and the fire that could be exploded in bamboo tubes.

The waging of war had been an art in Cathay, since the days when the armored regiments and chariots maneuvered over the wastes of Asia, and a temple was erected in the camp for the general commanding to meditate upon his plans undisturbed. Kwan-ti, the war god, never lacked devotees. The strength of Cathay was in the discipline of its trained masses, and its enormous reservoirs of human life. As to its weakness, a Cathayan general seventeen centuries ago had written ominously:

"A ruler can bring misfortune upon his army by attempting to govern it like a kingdom, when he is ignorant of the conditions faced by the army and within it. This is called hobbling an army. This causes restlessness among the soldiers.

"And when an army is restless and distrustful, anarchy results and victory is thrown away."

The weakness of Cathay was in its emperor, who must remain in Yen-king and leave matters of leadership to his generals; and the strength of the nomads beyond the wall was in the military genius of their Khan who led the army in person.

The case of Genghis Khan was very like that of Hannibal in Italy. He had a limited number of warriors. A single decisive defeat would send the nomads back into their deserts. A doubtful victory would be no gain. His success must be decisive without too great a loss in man-power. And he would be called upon to maneuver his divisions against armies led by masters of tactics.

Meanwhile, out in Karakorum, he was still the "Commander Against Rebels," still the subject of the Golden Emperor.

In the past when the fortunes of Cathay had been ascendant, the emperors had demanded tribute of the nomads beyond the great wall. In moments of weakness the dyna ties of Cathay had bought off the nomads, sending the such things as silver, floss silk, worked leather, carved ja and caravan loads of grain and wine, to keep them fro raiding. To manifest its honor, or, in other words, to sa its face the dynasty of Cathay would call these paymen gifts. But in the years of power the payments demande from the nomad khans were called tribute.

The predatory tribes that had not forgotten these ma nificent gifts, nor the annoying exactions of Cathayan of cials and the rare expeditions of the "hat and girdle" peop from the barrier of the great wall. Thus the peoples of th eastern Gobi were at the present moment nominally sul jects of the Golden Emperor, administered—in theory—b the absentee Warden of the Western Marches. Gengh Khan was entered in the roll of officials as Commande Against Rebels. In due course the scribes of Yen-kin combing over the records, sent emissaries to him to colle tribute of horses and cattle. This tribute he did not pa

The situation, you will perceive, was typically Chines The attitude of Genghis Khan may be described in tw words—watchful waiting.

In the course of his campaigns within the Gobi, he ha encountered the great wall and considered attentively thi rampart of brick and stone with its towers over the gate and its impressive summit upon which six horsemen coul gallop abreast.

More recently, he had caused his standard to be dis played from gate to gate along its nearest circuit—a ci cumstance to which the Warden of the Western Marche and the Golden Emperor paid not the slightest attentio But the frontier tribes, the buffer peoples, living withi the shadow of the wall and serving the monarch of Catha upon his hunting excursions, took full notice of this bol act and decided among themselves that the Golden Em peror was afraid of the nomad chieftain.

This was hardly the case. Secure within their walle cities, the millions of Cathay thought not at all of the hord of a quarter million warriors. Except that the Golden Em peror, in the course of his continual warfare with the an cient house of Sung in the south beyond the Son of th

Ocean, the Yang-tze, sent other emissaries to the Mongols to request the assistance of the nomad horsemen.

Several tumans were lent by Genghis Khan, quite readily. Chepé Noyon and others of the Orkhons commanded these cavalry divisions. What they effected on behalf of the Golden Emperor is unknown. But they used their eyes and asked questions.

They had all the nomad's ability to remember landmarks. And when they rode back to the horde in the Gobi they had a pretty good idea of the topography of Cathay.

They brought with them, also, tales of wonders. In Cathay, they said, the roads ran clear across the rivers, on stone platforms; wooden kibitkas floated on the rivers; all the largest cities had walls too high for a horse to leap.

Men in Cathay wore vests of nankeen and silks of all colors, and even some of the slaves had as many as seven vests. Instead of old minstrels, young poets entertained the court—not by droning hero legends but by writing words on a silk screen. And these words described the beauty of women. It was all very wonderful.

His officers were eager to launch themselves at the great wall. To have gratified them, to have led his wild clans at that time against Cathay would have meant disaster for the Khan. Calamity at home as well. If he left his new empire and suffered defeat in the east, in Cathay, other enemies would not hesitate at all to invade the Mongol dominion.

The Gobi Desert was his, but he could look south, southwest and west and see three formidable foemen. Along the Nan-lu, the southern caravan track, existed the curious kingdom of Hai—the so-called robber kingdom. Here were lean and predatory Tibetans, come down from the hills to plunder, and outlawed Cathayans. Beyond them extended the power of Black Cathay, a kind of mountain empire. And to the west, the roving hordes of Kirghiz who had kept out of the way of the Mongols.

Against all these troublesome neighbors, Genghis Khan sent portions of his horde, mounted divisions commanded by the Orkhons. He himself rode several seasons to war in the Hia country—a war of raids in open country that convinced the Hia chieftains it would be well to make peace with him. The peace was strengthened by a blood tie—one of the women of the royal family being sent to Gengh Khan for a wife. Other ties were made in the west. A this was caution—clearing his flanks in military parlance But it won him allies among the chieftains and recruit for the horde. And it gave the horde itself some very de sirable experience in campaigning.

Meanwhile the monarch of Cathay died; his son wa seated on the dragon throne, a son tall and superbl bearded, interested chiefly in painting and hunting. H called himself Wai Wang, an imposing title for a common place man.

In due course the mandarins of Cathay got out th tribute rolls for the new monarch, and an officer was sen into the plateaus of the Gobi to collect tribute fron Genghis Khan. He took with him also the proclamatio of the new sovereign, Wai Wang. This, an imperial edict should have been received on bended knees, but the Mon gol stretched out his hand for it and remained standing nor did he give it to an interpreter to read.

"Who is the new emperor?" he asked.

"Wai Wang."

Instead of inclining his head toward the south, the Khan spat. "I thought the son of Heaven should be an extraor dinary man; but an imbecile like Wai Wang is unworthy a throne. Why should I humiliate myself before him?"

With that he mounted his horse and rode away. Tha night the Orkhons were summoned to his pavilion, with his new allies, the Idikut of the Swooping Hawks, and the Lion Lord of the western Turks. The next day the envoy was called before the Khan and given a message to take back to the Golden Emperor.

"Our dominion," said the Mongol, "is now so well ordered that we can visit Cathay. Is the dominion of the Golden Khan so well ordered that he can receive us? We will go with an army that is like a roaring ocean. It matters not whether we are met with friendship or war. If the Golden Khan chooses to be our friend, we will allow him the government under us of his dominion; if he chooses war, it will last until one of us is victor, one defeated."

No more insulting message could have been sent Genghis Khan must have decided that the moment for invasion was at hand. While the old emperor lived he had felt bound, perhaps, by feudal allegiance to Cathay. With Wai Wang he had no concern.

The envoy returned to Yen-king where the court of Wai Wang resided. Wai Wang was angered by the response he brought with him.[2] The Warden of the Western Marches was asked what the Mongols were about. He replied that they were making many arrows and gathering horses. Thereupon, the Warden of the Western Marches was clapped into prison.

The winter was passing and the Mongols went on making many arrows and gathering horses. Unfortunately for the Golden Emperor, they did much more than that. Genghis Khan sent envoys and presents to the men of Liao-tung in the northern part of Cathay. He knew that these were warlike spirits who had not forgotten their conquest by a previous Golden Emperor.

This envoy met the prince of the Liao dynasty and a compact was sworn between them, and blood drawn and arrows broken to bind it. The men of Liao—literally the men of Iron—would invade the north of Cathay, and the Mongol Khan would restore to them all their old possessions. A compact, by the way, that Genghis Khan kept to the letter. Eventually he made the princes of Liao the rulers of Cathay, under himself.

[2]Some accounts have it that a Chin army was sent against the nearest of the Gobi clans, and this is very probably so, because we find the Mongols fighting outside the wall before their advance into the Chin empire.

CHAPTER IX

THE GOLDEN EMPEROR

OR THE FIRST TIME the nomad horde was moving to the vasion of a civilized power of much greater military rength. We are able to see Genghis Khan at work in the eld of war.

The first of the horde had been sent out of the Gobi ng since—spies and warriors who were to capture and ring back informers. These were already behind the great ail.

Next went the advance points, some two hundred riders attered over the countryside in pairs. Far behind these outs came the advance, some thirty thousand picked warors on good horses—at least two horses to a man—three mans, commanded by the veteran Muhuli, the fiery hepé Noyon and that surprising youngster Subotai, the lasséna of the Khan's marshals.

In close touch by courier with this advance, the main ody of the horde came over the barren plateaus, rolling the dust clouds. A hundred thousand, mostly Yakka ongols of long service, formed the center, and the right nd left wings numbered as many. Genghis Khan always ommanded the center, keeping his youngest son at his de for instruction.

Like Napoleon, he had his imperial guard, a thousand rong, mounted on black horses with leather armor. Probly in this first campaign of 1211 against Cathay, the orde was not in such strength.

It neared the great wall and passed through this barrier without delay or the loss of a man. Genghis Khan h been tampering for some time with the frontier clans, a one of the gates was opened to him by sympathizers.

Once within the wall the Mongol divisions separate going into different parts of Shan-si and Chih-li. They h definite orders. They needed no transport and did not kn the meaning of a base of supplies.

The first line of the Cathayan armies, mustered to gua the frontier roads, fared badly. The Mongol cavalry di sions nosed out the scattered forces of the Emperor, co posed mainly of foot soldiers, and rode them down, maki havoc with arrows shot from the back of a hard-runni horse into the close packed ranks of infantry.

One of the main armies of the Emperor, feeling its w toward the invaders, wavered among a labyrinth of gorg and small hills. The general in command, newly appointe did not know the country and had to ask his way of pea ants. Chepé Noyon, moving toward him, remembered ve well the roads and valleys of this district, and actua made a night march around the Chin forces, taking the in the rear the following day. This army was terribly c up by the Mongols, and the remnants of it, fleeing ea brought fear to the largest of the Chin armies.

This wavered in turn, and its general fled toward t capital. Genghis Khan reached Taitong-fu, the first of t large walled cities and invested it, then hurried on h divisions toward the reigning city, Yen-king.

The devastation wrought by the horde and its nearne filled Wai Wang with alarm, and this sitter in the drag throne would have fled from Yen-king if his ministers h not restrained him. The greatest defense of the empire w now rallying to Wai Wang as it always has in China wh the nation was menaced—the innumerable multitudes the middle-class, the stolid and devoted throngs, scions warlike ancestors, who knew no higher duty than to upho the throne.

Genghis Khan had broken down the first armed r sistance of Cathay with amazing rapidity. His divisions h captured a number of cities, though Taitong-fu, the We ern Court, still held out.

But he was faced, as Hannibal before Rome, with t real vitality of a stout-hearted domain. New armies a ared up the great rivers; the garrisons of beleaguered ties seemed to multiply. He passed through the outer rdens of Yen-king itself and beheld for the first time e stupendous extent of lofty walls, the hills and bridges d mounting roofs of a whole series of citadels.

He must have seen the uselessness of laying siege to such place, with his small numbers, because he drew back at ce, and when autumn came he ordered his standards ck to the Gobi.

In the following spring when his horses were restored strength he appeared again within the wall. He found e towns that had surrendered to him in the first cam-ign were now garrisoned and defiant, and he set to work ew. The Western Court was invested again and here he w kept the horde entire.

Apparently he used the siege as a kind of bait, waiting r the armies that were sent to relieve it and cutting them as they came. The war made manifest two things: the ongol cavalry could outmaneuver and destroy Cathayan mies in the field, but could not as yet take strong cities.

Chepé Noyon, however, managed to do this very thing. heir allies, the Liao princes, were hard beset by sixty ousand Cathayans up in the north, and appealed to the han for aid. He sent Chepé Noyon with a tuman, and e energetic Mongol general laid siege to Liao-yang itself the rear of the Cathayan forces.

The first efforts of the Mongols failed to gain them any-ing and Chepé Noyon, who was as impatient as Marshal ey, essayed a ruse that Genghis Khan had used in the ld, though not in siege work. He abandoned his baggage, rts and supplies in full sight of the Cathayans, and drew f with his horse herds as if giving up the struggle or fear-g the approach of a relieving army.

For two days the Mongols rode away slowly, then shifted their best horses and galloped back swiftly in a single ght "the sword in the rein hand." They arrived before iao-yang at daybreak. The Cathayans, convinced that e Mongols had retired, were occupied in plundering the ggage and carrying it within the walls—all gates open d the townspeople mingled with the warriors. The un-pected onset of the nomads took them completely by surprise, and the result was a terrible massacre follow by the storming of Liao-yang.

Chepé Noyon recovered all his own baggage and a go deal more.

But in pressing the siege of the Western Court, Geng Khan was wounded. His horde withdrew from Cathay, the tide ebbs from the shore, bearing him with it.

Every autumn it was necessary for them to go ba Fresh horses must be gathered together. During the su mer they had foraged—men and beasts—on the count but a winter in north China would not yield enough sus nance to the horde. Besides, there were warlike neighb to be kept at a distance.

The next season Genghis Khan did no more than laun a few raids—enough to keep the Cathayans from resti too much.

The war, his first on a grand scale, had fallen into sta mate. Unlike Hannibal, he could not leave his garris in the captured cities of the empire. His Mongols, una customed to fighting at that time from behind walls, wou have been annihilated by the Cathayans during the wint

A series of victories in the field, gained by screening t movements of his squadrons and uniting them by sw marches against the Cathayan armies, had resulted only driving the enemy forces within walls. He had come with sight of Yen-king itself, in his effort to get at the Emper but the master of the Chin could not be driven from t nearly impregnable citadel. Meanwhile the Chin armi were prevailing against the men of Liao-tung, and t riders of Hia who were supporting the flanks of the Kha

Under the circumstances, a nomad chieftain would ha been expected to let well enough alone, and to remain ou side the great wall with his booty of the past seasons a the prestige of victories gained over the great Chin pow But Genghis Khan, wounded and still inexorable, was gai ing experience and profiting by it, while foreboding beg to prey upon the Golden Emperor.

Foreboding grew to fear when the first grass came the spring of 1214. Three Mongol armies invaded Cath from different points. On the south the three sons of t Khan cut a wide swath across Shan-si; on the north Juc crossed the Khingan range and joined forces with the m Liao-tung; meanwhile Genghis Khan with the center of e horde reached the shore of the great ocean behind en-king.

These three armies operated in a new fashion. They re-ained separated; they settled down to the siege of the rongest cities, gathering the folk from the countryside and iving the captives before them in the first storm. More ten than not the Cathayans within the walls opened their ates. At such times, they were spared their lives, even hile everything in the open country was annihilated or iven off—crops trampled and burned, herds taken up, nd men, women and children cut down.

Confronted by this war à l'outrance, several Cathayan enerals went over to the Mongols with their commands, nd were installed with other officers of Liao-tung in the aptured cities.

Famine and disease, two of the four horsemen of the pocalypse, followed upon the heels of the Mongol riders. cross the sky line passed the train-bands of the horde, the ndless carts, the bullock herds, the horned standards.

As the season drew to its close, disease took its toll of ne horde. The horses were weak, ill-conditioned. Genghis han with the center of the horde camped near the bat-ements of Yen-king and his officers begged him to assault ne city.

Again he refused, but he sent a message to the Golden mperor.

"What do you think now of the war between us? All ne provinces north of the Yellow River are in my power. am going to my homeland. But could you permit my fficers to go away without sending gifts to appease them?"

A request extraordinary on the face of it, but a simple roke of policy on the part of the matter-of-fact Mongol. the Golden Emperor granted his demand, he would ave the gifts to reward his officers and satisfy their rest-ssness, and the prestige of the dragon throne would suffer reatly.

Some of the Cathayan councilors who knew the en-eebled condition of the horde besought the Emperor to ad out the forces in Yen-king against the Mongols. What esult this would have had, there is no telling. But the hin monarch had suffered too much to act boldly. He sent out to Genghis Khan five hundred youths and as ma girl slaves, with a herd of fine horses and loads of silk a gold. A truce was agreed on, and the Chins pledged the selves to allow the allies of the Khan, the Liao princes, remain unmolested in Liao-tung.

More than that, the Khan demanded—if there was be a truce between them—that he be given a wife of t imperial blood. And this lady of the reigning family w sent to him.

Genghis Khan did turn back to the Gobi that autum but on the edge of the desert he slew the multitude of ca tives that had been carried along by the horde—an act unprovoked cruelty.

(It appears to have been a custom of the Mongols put to death all captives, except artisans and savants, whe they turned their faces homeward after a campaign. Fe if any slaves, appear in the native lands of the Mongols this time. A throng of ill nourished captives on foot cou not have crossed the lengths of the barrens that surrounde the home of the nomads. Instead of turning them loose, t Mongols made an end of them—as we might cast off o garments. Human life had no value in the eyes of t Mongols, who desired only to depopulate fertile lands provide grazing for their herds. It was their boast at t end of the war against Cathay that a horse could be ri den without stumbling across the sites of many cities Cathay.)

Whether Genghis Khan would have left Cathay in pea is uncertain. But the Golden Emperor acted on his ow account. Leaving his eldest son in Yen-king, he fled sout

"We announce to our subjects that we shall change o residence to the capital of the south."

Thus the imperial decree—a weak gesture to preser his honor. His councilors, the governors of Yen-king, t elder Chin nobles, all besought him not to abandon h people. But go he did, and rebellion followed upon h flight.

CHAPTER X

THE RETURN OF THE MONGOLS

WHEN HE FLED with his entourage from the imperial city, he Chin Emperor left in the palace his son, the heir apparent. He did not wish to abandon the heart of his country vithout keeping in Yen-king some semblance of rule, some ndividual of the dynasty for the people to see. Yen-king vas strongly garrisoned.

But the chaos foreseen by the elder nobles now began o break up the armed forces of the Chins. Some of the roops escorting the Emperor mutinied and went off to join he Mongols.

In the imperial city itself a curious revolt took place. The hereditary princes, the officials and mandarins assemled and vowed fresh allegiance to the dynasty. Deserted y their monarch, they resolved to carry on the war themelves. Thronging into the streets, bareheaded in the rain, he stalwart soldiery of Cathay pledged itself to follow the ortunes of the Chin heir apparent and the nobles. The ld and deep spirit of loyalty manifested itself again in this noment, brought to the surface, as it were, by the flight f a weak ruler.

The Emperor sent couriers to Yen-king to recall his son o the south.

"Do not do that!" the elder Chins protested.

But the Emperor was obstinate, and his wish was still he supreme law of the land. The heir apparent left, igobly, and only some women of the family, the governors f the ancient city and eunuchs and soldiery remained in

Yen-king. Meanwhile the flame kindled by the devot nobles had stirred up veritable conflagrations. Mong garrisons and outposts were attacked, and a relieving arm sent to the much-distressed province of Liao-tung—army that achieved surprising success by the very élan th had created it.

This sudden reversal of affairs became known to t retreating horde. Genghis Khan halted his march a awaited a fuller report from the spies and officers who we hastening after him.

When he understood everything clearly, he acted once.

The most serviceable division he sent south toward t Yellow River with orders to pursue the retreating Em peror.

It was winter but the Mongols pushed on swiftly, forci the lord of the Chins to retire across the river into the d main of his old enemies the Sung. Even there the Mongo followed him, feeling their way among snow-covered mou tains, crossing ravines on spear shafts and the branches trees bound together with chains. Indeed, this divisio penetrated so far into a hostile country that it was cut o from the horde—though it still followed the tracks of t imperial fugitive, who appealed for aid to the Sung cou Couriers sent by the Khan recalled the wandering divisio which extricated itself somehow and made a wide circ around the Sung cities, crossing the Yellow River on t ice to safety.

Chepé Noyon was sent at a gallop back to the Gobi, quiet the chieftains at home.

Genghis Khan detached Subotai to go and look at t situation. This Orkhon disappeared from view for som months, sending back only routine reports as to the co dition of his horses. He found, apparently, nothing wor while in northern Cathay, because he returned to the hor bearing with him the submission of Korea. Left to his ow devices he had kept quiet and had circled the gulf of Lia tung to explore a new country. This disposition to wande when he was given an independent command, broug calamity to Europe in a later day.

The Khan himself remained with the nucleus of t horde near the great wall. He was fifty-five years of ag

Khan's menagerie (from the French)

s grandson Kubilai had been born, back in the pavilions -no longer the felt yurts—of the Gobi. His sons were own men; but in this crisis he gave the command of his visions to the Orkhons, the proved leaders of the horde, e men who could do no wrong and whose descendants y virtue of their ability, were never to suffer want or pun- hment. He had taught Chepé Noyon and Subotai how to andle mounted divisions, and he had tested the veteran Muhuli.

So Genghis Khan remained a spectator of the downfall f Cathay sitting in his tents, listening to the reports of allopers who rode to him without dismounting to cook ood or to sleep.

It was Muhuli aided by Mingan, a prince of Liao-tung, ho directed the thrust at Yen-king. With no more than ve thousand Mongols at his heels, he retraced his steps astward gathering as he went a multitude of Cathayan eserters and wandering bands of warriors. Subotai hover- ng on his flank, he pitched his tents before the outer walls f Yen-king.

With men enough in Yen-king to have endured a siege uccessfully, and with ample stock of weapons and all the araphernalia of war, the Cathayans were too disorganized o hold out. When fighting began in the suburbs one of the hin generals deserted. The women of the imperial house- old who begged to go with him, he left behind in the arkness. Looting began in the merchants' streets, and the nfortunate women wandered hopelessly among bands of houting and frightened soldiery.

Fire followed, springing up in various parts of the city. n the palace, eunuchs and slaves were to be seen flitting hrough the corridors, their arms filled with gold and silver rnaments. The hall of audience was deserted, and the sen- ies left their posts to join the pillagers.

Wang-Yen, the other general commanding, a prince of he blood, had received not so long ago a decree from the eparted Emperor, pardoning all criminals and prisoners n Cathay and increasing the gifts to the soldiers. A futile ast measure. It availed the solitary Wang-Yen not at all.

Matters being hopeless, the general commanding pre- ared to die as custom required. He retired to his cham- ers and wrote a petition to his Emperor acknowledging himself guilty and worthy of death in that he had not be able to defend Yen-king.

This valediction, as it might be called, he wrote on t lapel of his robe. Then he called in his servants and vided all his garments and wealth among them. Orderi the mandarin who attended him to prepare a cup of poiso he continued writing.

Then Wang-Yen asked his friend to leave the chambe and drank the poison. Yen-king was in flames, and t Mongols rode in upon a scene of defenseless terror.

The methodical Muhuli, indifferent to the passing of dynasty, occupied himself with collecting and sending the Khan the treasure and the munitions of the city.

Among the captive officers sent to the Khan was a prin of Liao-tung who had been serving the Cathayans. He w tall and bearded to the waist, and the Khan's attention w caught by his deep, clear voice. He asked the captive name and learned that it was Ye Liu Chutsai.

"Why didst thou abide with the dynasty that was t old enemy of thy family?" Genghis Khan asked.

"My father was a servant to the Chin, and others of m family also," the young prince replied. "It was not fittin that I should do otherwise."

This pleased the Mongol.

"Well hast thou served thy former master, and so tho canst serve me with trust. Be one among mine."

Some others who had deserted the dynasty he caused t be put to death, believing that they were not to be relie upon. It was Ye Liu Chutsai who said to him afterward "Thou hast conquered a great empire in the saddle. Tho canst not govern it so."

Whether the victorious Mongol saw the truth of thi or realized that in the learned Cathayans he had instru ments as important as their war engines capable of castin stones and fire, he permitted himself to be advised. He ap pointed governors for the conquered districts of Catha from among the Liao-tung men.

He must have realized that the fertile, humanity ridde land of Cathay could not be transformed into the dese grazing ground the Mongols desired. For the mercantil arts of the Chinese, their philosophy and the hierarchy o slaves and women he had, to be sure, utter contempt. H dmired the courage of the mandarins who had carried n the war after the desertion of their master, and in the ardihood and wisdom of these men he discerned some- hing useful to himself. Ye Liu Chutsai, for instance, could ame the stars and explain their portents.

When he carried back with him to Karakorum the treas- ures of the cities, he took also members of the literati of Cathay. He left the military government of his new prov- nces, and the eventual conquest of the Sung to Muhuli, praising him publicly and bestowing on him a banner em- broidered with nine white yak-tails.

"In this region," he explained to his Mongols, "the com- mands of Muhuli are to be obeyed as my commands."

No higher office could have been bestowed on the vet- eran. And Genghis Khan, as usual, kept to his compact. Muhuli was left undisturbed with his portion of the horde n his new domain.

Why the Mongol took this step is a matter for conjec- ture. He wished to return to strengthen his western fron- iers, beyond doubt. He may well have realized that the subjection of the whole of China would be a matter of ong years. But, undeniably, his interest in a foreign land ceased after its military conquest.

CHAPTER XI

KARAKORUM

UNLIKE OTHER CONQUERORS, Genghis Khan did not settle down in the most luxurious part of his new dominion, Cathay. When he rode through the great wall after the fall of the Chins, he did not return. He left Muhuli there as a war lord, and hastened back to the barren plateaus that were his birthright.

Here he had headquarters. Of the desert cities, he selected Karakorum, the Black Sands, as his ordu.

And here he assembled everything that a nomad could desire. A strange city, Karakorum, a metropolis of the barrens. Wind-swept and sand-whipped, The dwellings, dried mud and thatch, arranged without any thought of streets. Around it, the domes of black felt yurts.

The years of privation and of wandering were past. Vast stables housed in winter picked herds of horses bearing the Khan's brand. Granaries guarded against famine—millet and rice for men, hay for the horses. Caravanserais sheltered travelers and visiting ambassadors who were flocking out of all northern Asia.

From the south came Arab and Turkish merchants. With them Genghis Khan established his own method of dealing. He did not like to haggle. If the merchants tried to bargain with him their goods were taken without payment; if, on the other hand, they gave everything to the Khan, they received in return gifts that more than paid them.

Beside the district of the ambassadors was the quarter o the priests. Old Buddhist temples elbowed stone mosques and the small wooden churches of Nestorian Christians Every one was free to worship as he pleased as long as he obeyed the laws of the Yassa, and the rules of the Mongo camp.

Visitors were met by Mongol officers at the frontiers and forwarded to Karakorum with guides—word of their coming sent ahead by the busy couriers of the caravan routes Once within sight of the grazing herds, the black domes of the yurts, and the rows of the kibitkas on the treeless and hilless plain that surrounded the city of the Khan they were taken in charge by the Master of Law and Punishment.

In obedience to an old custom of the nomads, they were made to pass between two large fires. No harm came to them as a rule, but the Mongols believed that if any deviltry were concealed in them the fires would scorch them. Then they were given quarters and food and—if the Khan signified his assent—were led into the presence of the Mongol conqueror.

He held his court within a high pavilion of white felt lined with silk. By the entrance stood a silver table set with mare's milk, fruit and meat, so that all who came to him could eat as much as they wished. On a dais as the far end of the pavilion sat the Khan on a low bench with Bourtai or another wife below him on the left side.

Few ministers attended him—Ye Liu Chutsai, perhaps in his embroidered robes, majestic enough with his long beard and deep voice—a Ugur scribe with his roll of paper and brush—a Mongol noyon,[1] honorary cup-bearer. On benches around the walls of the pavilion other nobles sat in decorous silence, wearing the long wadded coats, with hanging girdles, the uptilted white felt hats, the undress uniform of the horde. In the center of the pavilion a fire of thorns and dung glowed.

Tar-khans, honored above all others, might swagger in at will, and take their seat on the benches, their feet crossed under them, scarred hands resting on the stalwart thighs of horsemen. Orkhons[2] and divisional commanders ight join them, carrying their maces. Conversation would e in low, drawling voices, and utter silence would pre- ail when the Khan spoke.

[1] Noyon or noian, commander of a tuman or division of ten thousand, sometimes merely a noble.

[2] Orkhon, or Ur-khan, commander of an army.

When he had said anything, that subject was closed. No an might add a word to his. Argument was a breach of anners—exaggeration a moral lapse, and lying a matter r the Master of Punishment. Words were few and pains- kingly exact.

Strangers were expected to bring gifts with them. The fts were taken in to the Khan before the visitors were assed in by the captain of that day's guard. Then the ewcomers were searched for weapons and cautioned gainst touching the threshold of the pavilion, or any of ne ropes—if it were a tent. To speak to the Khan they ust first kneel. After they had presented themselves at is ordu they must not depart until told to do so by the han.

Karakorum—now vanished under the encroaching sands f the Gobi—was ruled by an iron will. Men entering the rdu became servants of the Master of Thrones and rowns. Other laws did not exist.

"On joining the Tatars," said the stout-hearted monk, ra Rubruquis, "I thought myself entered into another orld."

It was a world that moved by the laws of the Yassa, and waited in silence the will of the Khan. The routine was ll military—and the utmost of order prevailed. The pavil- on of the Khan always faced south, and a space was left lear on this side. To right and left, as the children of Israel ad their appointed places about the Tabernacle, the people f the horde had their fixed stations.

The household of the Khan had grown. In their tents, cattered through the ordu, waited upon by their own eople he had other women than Bourtai of the gray eyes. le had taken to wife princesses of Cathay and Liao, daugh- rs of royal Turkish families and the most beautiful women f the desert clans.

He could appreciate beauty in women, not less than agacity and hardihood in men, and swiftness and endur- nce in fine horses. Once the attractive face and bearing f a girl in a captured province were described to him y a Mongol who did not know just where she might be found. "If she is really beautiful," the Khan answered in patiently, "I will find her."

An amusing story is told of a dream that disturbed hi —a dream that pictured one of his women plotting to har him. At the time he was in the field, as usual, and whe he waked he called out immediately: "Who is leader the guard at the tent entrance?"

When the officer in question had spoken his name, th Khan gave an order. "Such-and-such a woman is thine, a a gift. Take her to thy tent."

The matter of ethics he solved in a fashion all his ow Another concubine had yielded to the advances of a Mon gol of his household. When he had pondered this, the Kha did not put either of the two to death, but sent them fro his presence, saying, "I acted wrongly in taking to myse a girl of ignoble instincts."

Of all his sons he recognized only the four born of Bou tai as his heirs. They had been his chosen companion and he had watched them, giving each a veteran officer a tutor. When he had satisfied himself as to their differen natures and abilities he made them Orluks—Eagles—princes of the imperial blood. And they had their part t play in the orderly scheme of things.

Juchi the first-born was made Master of Hunting—fro which the Mongols still gleaned a great part of their sus tenance. Chatagai became Master of the Law and Punish ment; Ogotai was Master of Counsel; the youngest, Tul nominally chief of the army, the Khan kept at his side Juchi, whose son Batu founded the Golden Horde tha crushed Russia—Chatagai, who inherited Central Asi and whose descendant Babar was the first of the grea Moghuls of India—Tuli, whose son Kubilai reigned fro the China Sea to mid-Europe.

The youthful Kubilai was a favorite of the Khan, wh evidenced toward him all the pride of a grandfathe "Mark well the words of the boy Kubilai; they are fu of wisdom."

Upon his return from Cathay, Genghis Khan found th westerly half of his young empire highly demoralized. Th powerful Turkish peoples of central Asia, feudatories c the empire of Kara Khitai, had come under the hand of fted usurper, a certain Gutchluk, who was prince of the aimans and had been defeated some time before by the Iongols after the battle with the Karaïts.

Gutchluk seems to have raised himself to fame by most rofitable treachery. He allied himself with the still greater owers of the far west, and put to death his host, the han of Black Cathay. While Genghis Khan had been oc- upied beyond the great wall, he had disorganized the aluable Ugurs, and had slain the Christian khan of Al- alyk, a subject of the Mongol. The always restless Mer- its had left the horde and joined him.

With Gutchluk and his brief empire in the wide ranges hat extend from Tibet to Samarkand, Genghis Khan dealt ecisively upon his return to Karakorum. The horde was emounted on fresh horses and led against the Naimans. The lord of Black Cathay was tricked out of position and oundly whipped by the veteran Mongols;[3] Subotai was etached with a division to bring the Merkits to their roper sense of duty, and Chepé Noyon was gratified with he command of two tumans and orders to hunt down Gutchluk and bring him back dead.

With Chepé Noyon's adroit maneuvering among the anges we need not concern ourselves. He met the zeal of he Muhammadans by offering amnesty to all foes except Gutchluk, and opened the gates of the Buddhist temples hat had been closed by the war; then he chased the em- eror of a year over the Roof of the World until Gutch- uk was slain and his head sent back to Karakorum— vith the herd of a thousand white-nosed horses that the nergetic Mongol had been collecting on the side, as it vere.

The affair—and it might have been disastrous to the Khan if he had lost that first battle—had two results. The earest of the wild Turkish tribes, that stretched from Tibet across the heights to the steppes of Russia, became part of the horde. After the downfall of northern Cathay, hese same nomads held what might be called the balance of power in Asia. The victorious Mongols were still a minority.

[3] Gutchluk's empire included what was later the heart of Tamerlane's dominion. The military operations that brought about the defeat of the Naimans and Kara Titans were on a large scale. They are merely alluded to above because Genghis Khan did not take part in them.

And the opening of the temples gave Genghis Khan ne prestige. It was told from mountain city to valley cam that he had conquered Cathay, and the vast and shadov influence of Buddhist Cathay was enveloped around h person. On the other hand, the discomfited mullahs we gratified that they were not molested and were freed tithes and taxation. Under the snow summits of Tibe within the fiercest amphitheater of religious hatred in th world, bronze and mullah and lama were placed on a equal footing and warned. The shadow of the Yassa. E voys of the Khan—bearded Cathayans intoning the ne law of the conqueror, appeared to bring order out of chao Even as they were struggling to bring relief to Cathay be hind the iron willed Muhuli.

A courier galloped down the caravan tracks to the ex ultant Chepé Noyon, bringing word that the thousan horses had reached the Khan. "Do not become proud through success!"

Whether chastened or not, Chepé Noyon went on gath ering warriors under the ranges of Tibet. Nor did he re turn to Karakorum. There was work ahead for him i another quarter of the world.

Meanwhile, with the overthrow of Gutchluk, an armis tice as sudden and decisive as the fall of a curtain settle down on north Asia. From the China to the Aral sea on master reigned. Rebellion had ceased. The couriers of th Khan galloped over fifty degrees of longitude, and it wa said that a virgin carrying a sack of gold could ride un harmed from one border of the nomad empire to the othe

But this administrative activity did not altogether satisf the aging conqueror. He no longer relished the winte hunts over the prairies. One day in the pavilion at Kara korum he asked an officer of the Mongol guard what, i all the world, could bring the greatest happiness.

"The open steppe, a clear day, and a swift horse unde you," responded the officer after a little thought, "and falcon on your wrist to start up hares."

"Nay," responded the Khan, "to crush your enemie to see them fall at your feet—to take their horses an goods and hear the lamentation of their women. That best."

The Master of Thrones and Crowns was also the courge. His next move was one of conquest, terrible in s effect, and it was toward the west. And it came about a most curious way.

Part Three

CHAPTER XII

THE SWORD-ARM OF ISLAM

UNTIL NOW the dominion of Genghis Khan had been confined to far Asia. He had grown up in his deserts and his first contact with civilization had been in Cathay.

And from the cities of Cathay he had gone back to the grazing lands of his native plains. More recently, the affair with Gutchluk, and the arrival of Muhammadan merchants had taught him something about the other half of Asia.

He knew now that beyond the ranges of his westerly border existed fertile valleys where snow never fell. Here, also, were rivers that never froze. Here multitudinous peoples lived in cities more ancient than Karakorum or Yen-king. And from these peoples of the west came caravans that brought finely tempered steel blades and the best chain mail—white cloth and red leather, ambergris and ivory, turquoise and rubies.

To reach him, these caravans had to cross the barrier of mid-Asia, the network of mountain ranges that extended roughly northeast and southwest of the Tagh-dumbash, the Roof of the World. From time immemorable this mountain barrier had existed. It was the mountain Kâf of the early Arabs. It stood, vast and partially desolate, between the nomads of the Gobi and the rest of the world.

From time to time some of the nomad peoples had broken through the barrier, driven out by stronger nations still farther east. The Huns and Avars had disappeared into the ranges, and had not come back.

And at intervals the conquerors of the west had advanced as far as the other side of these ranges. Seventeen centuries ago the kings of Persia had come with their mailed cavalry toward the east, to the Indus and Samarkand—within sight of the bulwarks of the Tagh-dumbash. Two centuries later the reckless Alexander had advanced with his phalanx exactly as far.

So these ranges formed a kind of gigantic continental divide, separating the plains-dwellers of Genghis Khan from the valley-dwellers of the west, which was called by the Cathayans Ta-tsin, the Far Country. A gifted Cathayan general had once led an army up into these solitudes, but until now no army had ventured to make war beyond the ranges.

Now Chepé Noyon, the most impetuous of the Mongol Orkhons, had quartered himself in the heart of these ranges. And Juchi had wandered toward the setting sun into the steppe region of the Kipchak tribes. They had reported two roads through the mountain chains.

For the moment Genghis Khan was interested in trade. The goods and especially the weapons of the Muhammadan peoples beyond the rampart of mid-Asia were a great luxury to the simple-living Mongols. He encouraged his own merchants—subject Muhammadans—to send their caravans to the west.

He learned that his nearest neighbor to the west was the Shah of Kharesm, himself conqueror of a wide domain. To this Shah the Khan sent envoys, and a message.

"I send thee greeting. I know thy power and the great extent of thine empire, and I look upon thee as a most cherished son. On thy part, thou must know that I have conquered Cathay and many Turkish nations. My country is an encampment of warriors, a mine of silver, and I have no need of other lands. To me it seems that we have an equal interest in encouraging trade between our subjects."

For a Mongol of that day, this was a mild message. To the dead Emperor of Cathay, Genghis Khan had sent sheer provocative insult. To Ala-eddin Muhammad, Shah of Kharesm, he forwarded a matter-of-fact invitation to trade. There was, to be sure, disparagement in calling the Shah his son—which in Asia implies a dependent. And there as a barb in the mention of the conquered Turkish clans. he Shah was a Turk.

Mongol yurts on the move

The envoys of the Khan brought rich gifts to the Shah, ars of silver, precious jade and white camel's hair robes. ut the barb rankled. "Who is Genghis Khan?" he de- anded. "Has he really conquered China?"

The envoys replied that this was so.

"Are his armies as great as mine?" the Shah then asked.

To this the envoys made response tactfully—they were Muhammadans, not Mongols—that the host of the Khan as not to be compared to his own. The Shah was satis- ed, and agreed to the mutual intercourse of merchants. Matters went well enough for a year or so.

Meanwhile the name of Genghis Khan became known n other Muhammadan lands. The Kalif of Bagdad was hen being oppressed by this same Shah of Kharesm. And he Kalif was persuaded that his cause might be aided by he shadowy Khan on the borderland of Cathay. An envoy as sent from Bagdad to Karakorum, and since he must ass through the lands of the Shah to get there, certain recautions were taken.

The chronicle has it that the authorization of this envoy as written on his skull with a fire pencil after his hair was haved off. The hair was then allowed to grow, and the nvoy was given his message of appeal to study until he ad it by heart. All went well. The agent of the Kalif eached the Mongol Khan, his skull was shaved again, his dentity established and his message repeated.

Genghis Khan paid no attention to it. In all probability he solitary emissary and the furtive appeal did not im- ress him favorably. Besides, there was the trade agree- nent with the Shah.

But the Mongol's experiment with trade came to an brupt end. A caravan of several hundred merchants from Karakorum was seized by one Inaljuk, governor of Otrar, frontier citadel belonging to the Shah. Inaljuk reported to is master that spies were among the merchants—which nay very well have been the case.

Muhammad Shah without considering the matter over- nuch, sent to his governor an order to slay the merchants, nd all of them, accordingly, were put to death. This, in due time, was reported to Genghis Khan who dispatched envoys at once to the Shah to protest. And Muhamma saw fit to slay the chief of the envoys and burn off th beards of the others.

When the survivors of his embassy returned to Gengh Khan, the master of the Gobi went apart to a mountain meditate upon the matter. The slaying of a Mongol envo could not go unpunished; tradition required revenge fo the wrong inflicted.

"There cannot be two suns in the heavens," the Kha said, "or two Kha Khans upon the earth."

Then spies were sent in earnest through the mounta ranges and couriers whipped over the desert to summo men to the standards of the horde. A brief and ominou message went this time to the Shah.

"Thou hast chosen war. That will happen which wi happen, and what it is to be, we know not. God alon knows."

War, inevitable in any case between these two con querors, had begun. And the careful Mongol had h casus belli.

To understand what lay before him, we must loo beyond the ranges, where lay the world of Islam and th Shah.

It was a martial world, appreciative of song, with an ea not unmusical. A world beset by inward throes, slav ridden, wealth gathering, and more than a little addicte to vice and intrigue. It left the management of its affai to extortioners and its women to the custody of eunuch and its conscience to the keeping of Allah.

It followed various dogmas, and it interpreted th Koran in different ways. It gave alms to beggars, washe scrupulously, gathered in sunlit courtyards to gossip, an lived largely by favor of the great. At least once during i lifetime it made the journey to the black meteorolite un der a velvet curtain within Mecca, the stone that was th Ka'aba. Upon this pilgrimage the men of Islam rubbe shoulders, renewed their zeal, and came home rather awe by the immensity of their lands and the multitudes of th believers.

Centuries ago their prophet had lighted a fire that ha been carried far by the Arabs. Since then all the variou eople of Islam had been united in a common cause—onquest. The first waves of warriors had spread to Graada in Spain, and all northern Africa, Sicily and Egypt. time the military power of Islam had passed from the rabs to the Turks, but both had joined in the holy war gainst the mailed host of Christian crusaders that came wrest Jerusalem from them.

Now in the beginning of the thirteenth century Islam as at the height of its martial power. The weakening cruaders had been driven to the coast of the Holy Land, and e first wave of the Turks were taking Asia Minor away om the soldiery of the degenerate Greek empire.

In Bagdad and Damascus the Kalifs—heads of Islam -maintained all the splendor of the days of Haroun al ashïd and the Barmecides. Poetry and song were fine ts; a witty saying was the making of a man. A certain bservant astronomer, Omar al Khayyam, remarked that en who believed that the pages of the Koran held all arthly lore looked more often upon the engraving at the ottom of a bowl.

Even the reflective Omar could not ignore the splendid ageantry of martial Islam—

> "How Sultan after Sultan with his pomp > Abode his destined hour and went his way."

The courts of Jamshid, the golden throne of Mahmoud
-Omar, penning his disconsolate quatrains, paused to onder at them. And to speculate upon the possibilities the paradise that awaited these paladins of Islam.

Both Omar and Haroun had been for some time in eir graves, but the descendants of Mahmoud of Ghazna led northern India. The Kalifs of Bagdad had grown ther worldy wise, indulging in politics rather than conuest. But the chivalry of Islam—that could forget its ward quarrels and unite against an enemy of the faith -was no less resplendent and lighthearted than in the ys when Haroun had jested with his cup-companions.

They lived, these scions of warlike princes, in a fertile orld, where rivers flowing down from forested ranges ade the sand and clay of desert beds give forth abun-ntly of grain and fruit. A warm sun quickened intellect, and a desire for luxury. Their weapons were fashioned b skilled armorers—steel blades that could be bent doubl shields gleaming with silver work. They wore chain ma and light steel helmets. They rode blooded horses, swi of foot but not too long enduring. And the secrets of flan ing naphtha and the terrible Greek fire were known t them.

Their life had many diversions:

"Verse and song and minstrelsy, and wine full flowing and sweet.
"Backgammon and chess and the hunting ground, and the falcon and cheetah fleet.
"Field and ball, and audience hall, and battle and banquet rare.
"Horse and arms and a generous hand and praise of my lord and prayer." [1]

In the center of Islam, Muhammad Shah of Kharesi had enthroned himself as war lord. His domain extende from India to Bagdad, and from the sea of Aral to th Persian Gulf. Except for the Seljuk Turks, victors over th crusaders, and the rising Mamluk dynasty in Egypt, h authority was supreme. He was the emperor, and the Kal —who quarreled with him but might not deny him—wa restricted to the spiritual authority of a pope.

Muhammad Shah of the Kharesmian empire[2] came, lik Genghis Khan, from a nomad people. His ancestors ha been slaves, cup-bearers to the great Seljuk Malik Shah. H and his atabegs or father-chieftains, were Turks. A tru warrior of Turan, he had something of military genius, grasp of things political and no end of avarice.

We know that the indulged too much in cruelty, puttin his followers to death to gratify impulses. He could sla a venerable sayyid, and then demand absolution from th Kalif. Failing in this, he could denounce the Kalif and s up another. Hence the dispute that led to the sending o an envoy to Genghis Khan from Bagdad.

Then, too, Muhammad had his share of ambition an ve of praise. He liked to be called the Warrior, and his urtiers extolled him as a second Alexander. He matched s mother's intrigues with oppression and wrangled with e wazir who administered his affairs.

[1] From A Literary History of Persia, by Edward G. Browne.

[2] Kharesm hardly appears in the pages of history. Like Kara K'itai and t empire of the Chin, it was blotted out by the Mongols before it reached the fu scope of its power.

The core of his host of four hundred thousand warriors as made up of the Kharesm Turks, but he had besides e armies of the Persians at his summons. War elephants, st camel trains, and a multitude of armed slaves followed m.

But the main defense of his empire was the chain of eat cities along the rivers, Bokhara the center of Islam's ademies and mosques, Samarkand of the lofty walls nd pleasure gardens, Balkh, and Herat, the heart of horassan.

This world of Islam, with its ambitious Shah, its multi-ides of warriors and its mighty cities, was almost unknown Genghis Khan.

CHAPTER XIII

THE MARCH WESTWARD

WO PROBLEMS had to be solved before Genghis Khan ould lead his army against the Muhammadan Turks. /hen he had moved to the conquest of China he had .ken most of his desert confederacy with him. Now he ıust leave a vast empire behind him for several years—an mpire newly knit, which must be governed even from the ther side of the mountain ranges.

With this problem he dealt in his own way. Muhuli was eeping Cathay occupied with fire and sword, and the rinces of Liao were busy enough restoring order behind im. Genghis Khan combed over the rest of his empire or notables in the conquered countries, men of family and mbition who might cause trouble in his absence. To each f these a Mongol courier was sent with a silver tablet and summons to the horde. On the pretense of needing their ervices the Khan took them with him out of the empire.

The government itself he proposed to keep in his own ands wherever he went. He would communicate by mes- enger with the council of the khans in the Gobi. One of is brothers he left as governor in Karakorum.

This accomplished, there remained the second and reater problem—to transport the horde of a quarter mil- on warriors from Lake Baïkul over the ranges of mid-Asia nto Persia. A distance of some two thousand miles as the row flies, and a country wherein travelers to-day only enture with a well-equipped caravan. A march impossible or a modern army of that size.

He had no doubt of the ability of the horde to make t march. In it, he had fashioned a fighting force that was ab to go anywhere on land. Half of it never saw the Go again, but some of his Mongols marched over ninety d grees of longitude and back again.

In the spring of 1219, he gave orders for the horde rendezvous in the pasture lands of a river in the sout west. Here assembled the tumans under the different ma shals, each man bringing with him a string of four or fi horses. Great herds of cattle were driven to the pasture and fattened comfortably during the summer. The youn est son of the Khan arrived to assume command, and the first crisp days of autumn the Khan himself rode ov from Karakorum.

He had spoken a word to the women of the nomad em pire: "Ye may not bear arms, yet there is a duty for y Keep well the yurts, against the return of the men, so th the couriers and the traveling noyons may have a clea place and food when they halt at night. A wife may th do honor to a warrior."

Apparently it struck him during this ride to his host th he himself might not return alive. Passing through a fi woodland, and looking at a lofty grove of pines, he r marked:

"A good place for roe-deer, and for hunting. A goo resting place for an old man."

He gave orders that upon his death the Yassa, his co of laws, was to be read aloud, and men were to live a cording to it. For the horde and his officers he had oth words:

"Ye go with me, to strike with our strength the man wh has treated us with scorn. Ye shall share in my victorie Let the leader of ten be as vigilant and obedient as th leader of ten thousand. If either fail in duty he will b deprived of life, and his women and children also."

After a conference with his sons and Orkhons and th various chieftains, the Khan rode out to review the di ferent camps of the horde. He was fifty-six years old, h broad face lined, the skin hardened. He sat, his knee hunched up in the short stirrups, in the high peaked sad dle of a swift-footed white charger.

In his up-tilted white felt hat were eagle feathers, an ed cloth streamers hung down before either ear—like the orns of a beast, but serviceable otherwise to bind on the at in a high wind. His long-sleeved black sable coat was ound with a girdle of gold plates or cloth of gold. He rode lown the lines of the assembled squadrons, saying little. The horde was better equipped than ever before. The shock livisions had their horses encased in lacquered leather—ed or black. Every man had two bows, and a spare arrow ase covered to protect it against dampness. Their helmets vere light and serviceable, with a leather drop, iron-tudded, to guard the neck behind.

Only the regiment of the Khan's guard had shields. Be-ides the saber, the men of the heavy cavalry had axes anging from their belts, and a length of rope—lariats, or ords for pulling siege engines and bogged-down carts. Kits were small and strictly serviceable—leather sacks olding nose-bags for the pony and a pot for the man; wax, nd files for sharpening the arrow heads, and spare bow-prings. Later on, every man would have his emergency ations—smoke-cured meat, and dry milk curds. This dried milk could be put into water and heated.

At present they were merely route marching. Many Cathayans were with them, and a new division. Appar-ently it was of ten thousand men, and its officer was a Cathayan, the Ko pao yu or Master of Artillery, and his men were skilled in building and working the heavy siege engines, the ballista, mangonels and fire throwers. These machines, it seems, were not carried entire, but their parts were stowed in the wagons. As to the ho-pao, the fire-gun, we shall see it in action later.

Slowly, the horde moved through the smaller ranges, driving the cattle herds. It was about two hundred thou-sand strong—too great a number to keep together, as they must live on the herds and the country. Juchi, the eldest son, was detached with a couple of tumans, to join Chepé Noyon on the other side of the T'ian shan. The rest spread out, keeping to the valleys.

Early in the march an incident filled the astrologers with misgivings. Snow fell before its proper time. The Khan sent for Ye Liu Chutsai and demanded the meaning of the portent.

"It signifies," replied the astute Cathayan, "that the lo of the cold and wintry lands will overcome the lord of t warm climates."

The Cathayans must have suffered that winter. Amo them were men skilled in brewing herbs to cure sickne and when a lance, stuck with its point in the ground b fore a tent, showed that a Mongol was sick within, the savants of herbs and stars were called upon for a remed Many other non-combatants kept them company—inte preters, merchants to act as spies later, mandarins to ta over the administration of captured districts. Nothing w overlooked, and every detail had to be kept in orde Even lost articles had to be cared for—an officer had be appointed for this.

Metal work on the armor and saddles must be ke polished, and kits filled. The march began when the da drum-roll sounded, the herds being started off first, and t warriors following with the carts. At evening, the her would be overtaken, the standard of the officer comman ing pitched, and the camp would rise around it, the wa riors taking their yurts from the camels or carts.

Rivers had to be crossed. The horses, roped togethe by the saddle horns, twenty or more in a line, breaste the current. Sometimes the riders had to swim, holding the tails. A branch would be thrust into the leather k and the lacing tightened, so it would float, tied to the wa rior's girdle. Before long they could cross rivers on t ice.

Snow covered everything, even the sand dunes of t wastes. Withered gray tamarisk danced under the wi gusts, like the ghosts of old men. The trails were mark by antelopes' or wild sheep's horns projecting through t drifts.

Juchi's division of the horde tended off to the sout dropping from seven-thousand foot passes into the Pe l the Great North Road, above the T'ian shan. Here, on o of the oldest trade routes of Asia, they encountered lin of shaggy camels, bound nose-cord to tail, plodding alo to the chiming of rusty bells—hundreds of them laden wi cloth or rice or what-not, following a half dozen men a a dog.

The main body of the horde moved more slowly we ard, dropping through gorges and over frozen lakes to e icy floor of the Sungarian gate, the pass from which l the nomad clans have come out of high Asia. Here they ere buffeted by winds and chilled by a cold so great that hole herds might be frozen if caught in the pass during buran, a black wind storm. By now most of the cattle ad died off and had been eaten. The last stores of hay had nished; the carts, perforce, had been left behind, and ly the hardiest of the camels survived.

"Even in the middle of summer," the Cathayan Ye Liu hutsai wrote, of the westward march, "masses of ice and ow accumulate in these mountains. The army passing at road was obliged to cut its way through the ice. The nes and larch trees are so large that they seem to reach eaven. The rivers west of the Chin shan (Golden mountins) all run to the west."

To protect them, the hoofs of the unshod ponies were ound up in strips of yak skins. The horses seemed to ffer from the lack of fodder, and began to bleed at the ins.

Entering the western ranges beyond the Gate of the inds, the warriors cut down trees, hewing out massive mbers to be used in bridging the gorges. The ponies dug moss and dry grass with their hoofs from under the ow. The hunters went afield for game. Forging ahead in e utter cold of high Asia, a quarter million men enured hardships that would have put a modern division to hospital. The Mongols did not mind it particularly. rapped up in their sheepskins and leather, they could ep under drifting snow; at need, the round, heavy yurts armed them. When food failed, they opened a vein in a rse, drank a small quantity of blood and closed the vein.

On they went, scattered over a hundred miles of mountin country, the sledges rolling in their wake, the bones dead animals marking their trail.

Before the snow melted they were out on the western eppes, riding more swiftly around bleak Lake Balkash. y the time the first grass showed, they were threading into e last barrier of the Kara Tau, the Black Range. On lean rses, they finished the first twelve hundred miles of their arch.

Now the various divisions closed up, liaison officers began to gallop back and forth between the commands; t nondescript looking merchants rode off in groups of t or three to hunt information. A screen of scouts was thro ahead of each column.

Men overhauled their kits, counted arrows, laughed a gathered around the fires where the minstrels knelt, dro ing their chants of departed heroes and strange magic.

Through the forests, they could see below them the fi frontier of Islam, the wide river Syr, now swollen spring freshets.

CHAPTER XIV

THE FIRST CAMPAIGN

MEANWHILE Juchi and Chepé Noyon had had a pitched attle with the Muhammadans under the Roof of the Vorld. It is worth telling about.

The Muhammadan Shah was in the field before the Mongols. Fresh from victories in India, he had mustered s host of four hundred thousand. He had gathered his abegs, and strengthened his Turks with contingents of rabs and Persians. This host he had led north, searching or the Mongols who were not yet on the scene. He met nd attacked some of Chepé Noyon's patrols who were not ware of the war, and the appearance of these fur-clad omads on their shaggy ponies aroused the contempt of ne much better clad Kharesmians. When his spies brought im accounts of the horde, the Shah did not alter his opin-on. "They have conquered only unbelievers—now the anners of Islam are arrayed against them."

Soon the Mongols were visible. Raiding detachments escended the heights toward the wide river Syr. They ap-eared at villages in fertile valleys, driving off the herds, athering up all available grain and foodstuffs; they set re to the dwellings and retired in the smoke. Their carts nd herds were sent back to the north with detachments f warriors and a day later they rode into a village fifty iles away.

These were the advance foragers, collecting supplies or the main army. There was no telling where they came rom, or whither they went. They had been sent out by

Juchi who was approaching through a long valley cha from the east, on the Pe Lu. Having an easier route th the main body of the horde, he was passing through t last ranges a little in advance of his father's horde.

Muhammad Shah left the bulk of his host at the S and pushed up the river toward its headwaters, worki east through the ranges. Whether he learned of Juch advance from his scouts, or stumbled against this Mong division by accident, he encountered it squarely in th long valley hemmed in by the forested bulwarks of t mountains.

His army was several times the strength of the Mong division, and Muhammad—beholding for the first time t dark mass of fur and leather clad warriors without shiel or chain mail—thought only of launching his attack b fore the strange horsemen could escape.

His disciplined Turks mustered in battle formation, a long trumpets and cymbals sounded.

Meanwhile the Mongol general with Juchi advised t Mongol prince to retire at once and try to draw the Tur after him toward the main body of the horde. But th eldest son of the Khan gave the order to charge the M hammadans. "If I flee, what then shall I say to my father"

He was in command of the division, and when th order had been given the Mongols got them to horse wit out protest. Genghis Khan would never have suffered hin self to be caught thus in the valley, or—being caught—would have drawn back until the array of the Shah ha scattered in pursuit of him. But the headstrong Juchi sh his men forward, the suicide squad [1] first in the advanc the heavy shock cavalry following, swords in the rein hanc and long lances in the right hands. The lighter squadron covered his flanks.

Being thus launched forward, without room fo maneuvering, or time for their favorite play of arrows, th Mongol horsemen drove in grimly, using their heavie slightly curved swords against the scimitars of the Turks

The chronicle relates that the losses of the Muhamma dans were beyond all counting, and as the Mongol ad vance penetrated within the center of the Turks, the Sha

[1] The Mangudai, or "God-belonging" squadron, pre-doomed.

mself was in danger. He saw within arrow flight the rned standards of the horde, and only the desperate forts of his household divisions saved him from death. nd Juchi's life was saved, so the story runs, by a Cathayan ince who was serving in his command.

Meanwhile the Mongol flanks had been driven in, and lal ed-Din, the favorite of the Kharesmian army, the dest son of the Shah—a true Turk, small and slender id dark, loving only hard drinking and swordplay—rove home a counter charge that forced back the standrds of the Mongols. The hosts of horsemen separated, at ie end of the day, and during the night the Mongols played ne of their customary tricks. They either set fire to the rass in the valley, or kept their own camp fires burning gh as long as darkness lasted. Meanwhile Juchi and his en had withdrawn, mounting fresh horses and making march of two days in that night.

Sunrise found Muhammad and his battered squadrons ccupying a valley filled with the bodies of the slain. The Mongols had vanished.

A ride over the battlefield filled the hitherto victorious urks with misgivings. The chronicle says they lost 160,-00 men in this first battle—a number certainly exagerated, but evidence of the effect of the Mongol impact pon them—and the Muhammadan warriors were always nfluenced by success or failure at the commencement of campaign. Upon the Shah himself the influence of the rrible struggle in the valley was no less great. "A fear f these unbelievers was planted in the heart of the Sultan, nd an estimation of their courage. If any one spoke of iem before him, he said that he had never seen men as aring and as steadfast in the throes of battle, or as skilled i giving blows with the point and edge of their swords."

No longer did the Shah think of searching for the horde i the high valleys. The country, arid in any case, had een combed over by the Mongol foragers, and could not upport an army as large as his. But more than this, his read of the strange foemen impelled him to turn back o his fortified towns along the river Syr. He sent south or reënforcements, especially for bowmen. He announced iat he had won a complete victory, and in token thereof, distributed robes of honor among the officers who had a tended him.

Genghis Khan listened to a courier's report of the fi conflict. He praised Juchi—and sent him a supporti force of five thousand, with instructions to follow aft Muhammad.

The Mongols of Juchi—the detached left wing of t
horde—were riding through one of the garden spots high Asia, where every stream had its white walled villa and watchtower. Here grew melons and strange fruits; t slender towers of minarets uprose in growths of willo and poplars. To right and left were mellow foothills, wi cattle grazing on the slopes. Behind them, the white sun mits of the higher ranges reared against the sky.

"Kudjan (Khokand) abounds in pomegranates," t observant Ye Liu Chutsai noted down in his geograph of the journey. "They are as large as two fists and of sour-sweet taste. People take the fruit and press out t juice into a vessel—a delicious beverage for slaking thirs Their watermelons weigh fifty pounds, and two are a loa for a donkey."

After the winter in the frozen passes, this was luxu indeed for the Mongol horsemen. The river widened, an they came upon a large walled city, Khojend. Here t supporting division of five thousand awaited them, whi laying siege to Khojend.

The commander of the Turks in the city was a ma of valor. Timur Malik, the Iron Lord. He had withdraw to an island with a thousand picked men and had du himself in. Events took a peculiar turn.

Here the river was wide, the island fortified. Timu Malik had taken with him all available boats; there we no bridges. The Mongols had orders not to leave a fort fied city behind them. And they could not reach the islan with the stones cast by their siege engines.

Timur Malik, a fine example of a shrewd and co rageous Turk, would not be lured from his island. So t Mongols laid siege to it in their methodical way—Juch who dared not delay, passing on down the river, leavi a noyon in command.

They sent out videttes, and swept in a multitude of e people of the countryside, and set them to work col-ting large stones and carrying them to the bank of the r. A stone causeway began to grow out toward the and of Timur Malik, who did not remain idle.

He selected a dozen barges, built wooden bulwarks ound them, filled them with his archers and rowed over ily to the shore to shoot at the Mongols. And the artilists from Cathay fashioned a weapon to deal with the rges. First ballista were built—machines for casting nes. Only, instead of stones, the Mongols shot fire-pots the boats—jars or kegs filled with flaming sulphur, or other concoction of the Cathayan artillerists. Timur alik altered his barges, building sloping side walls and ofs, apparently, covered with earth. He left embrasures what we might call arrow ports—for his bowmen.

The daily battle of the ships against the artillery was sumed; but the causeway grew longer and Timur Malik w that he could not hold out on his island. He filled the gest of his river-craft with his people—placed his best rriors in the covered barges and evacuated the island, ating down the river at night, by torch-light. He broke heavy chain the Mongols had stretched across the Syr.

But the Mongol horsemen kept pace with him in his ght down the river. Juchi, who had gone ahead, conucted a bridge of boats far down the river, and set his gineers to work on stone casters to deal with the flotilla.
ord of these preparations reached the resourceful Turk
d he landed his people on an isolated stretch of bank.
he Mongols missed them on the river, searched for them d found them. Timur Malik, fleeing with a small guard warriors, saw all his men cut down.

Left without a follower, he kept on, and being well ounted drew ahead of all but three Mongols. The nearest the three he killed by good fortune—an arrow that went me in the rider's eye. "I have two other shafts in my iver," he called to the two surviving pursuers, "and ey will not fail of the mark."

But these last arrows were not needed. He escaped in e next night and managed to join the paladin, Jelal ed-n, the son of the Shah, far in the south. The bravery of Timur Malik was remembered and repeated by Mong and Turk alike. He had held up a division of the hor for months. The siege showed the resourcefulness of t Mongols in facing new conditions, but it was no more th an incident in the war that was now raging on a front a thousand miles.

CHAPTER XV

BOKHARA

WHEN the Shah rode down from the higher ranges, he rned north toward the Syr with his host, waiting for the rival of the horde itself, intending to give battle when attempted to cross the river. But he waited in vain.

To appreciate what happened now we must glance at the ap. This northern portion of Muhammad's empire was lf fertile valley land, half arid and sandy plains, cut up to strata of red clay, dust covered and lifeless. So the ties existed only along the rivers and within the hills.

Two mighty rivers flowed north-west across this desert oor, to empty their waters six hundred miles away into e salt sea of Aral. The first of these rivers was the Syr, e Jaxartes of the ancients. And here were walled cities ined by caravan roads—a kind of chain of human life id dwellings extending through the barrens. The second ver, to the south, was the Amu, once called the Oxus. nd near this stood the citadels of Islam, Bokhara and markand.

The Shah was encamped behind the Syr, unable to learn hether the Mongols were moving. He expected fresh rmies from the south and the revenues of a new tax levy. his mobilization was interrupted by alarming news. Mon- ls had been seen descending from the high passes two ndred miles to his right, and almost in his rear.

What had happened was that Chepé Noyon, leaving chi, had crossed the mountains to the south—had stolen up on the Turkish contingents that were watchi this route into Kharesm, and was now marching swift around the glaciers of the Amu headwaters. And, n more than a couple of hundred miles distant, Samarka lay in his path. Chepé Noyon had no more than twen thousand men with him, but the Shah could not know th

Muhammad, instead of being reënforced, was no in a fair way to be cut off from his second and main li of defense, the Amu with its great cities, Bokhara a Samarkand. Aroused by the new danger, Muhamm did something for which he has been severely criticiz by Muhammadan chroniclers in later years. He split half his host among the fortified cities.

Some 40,000 were sent to strengthen the garriso along the Syr, and he marched south with the bulk his forces, detaching 30,000 toward Bokhara, and lea ing the rest to Samarkand, the menaced point. He d this, assuming that the Mongols would not be able storm his citadels, and would retire after a season of rai ing and plundering. He was mistaken in both surmises.

Even before this two sons of the Khan had appear at Otrar, down the Syr to the north. Otrar, whose go ernor had put to death Mongol merchants. Inaljuk, wh had ordered the execution of the merchants was still go ernor of the city. Knowing that he had little mercy to expe from the Mongols, he shut himself up in the citadel wi the best of his men, and held out for five months. He foug to the end, taking refuge in a tower when the Mongo had cut down or captured the last of his men; and wh his arrows gave out, he still hurled stones down on h foes. Taken alive, in spite of this desperation, he was se to the Khan who ordered molten silver to be poured in his eyes and ears—the death of retribution. The walls Otrar were razed and all its people driven away.

While this was going on a second Mongol army a proached the Syr and took Tashkent. A third detachme scoured the northern end of the Syr, storming the small towns. The Turkish garrison abandoned Jend, and t townspeople surrendered when the Mongols planted the ladders and swarmed along the walls. In such cases this first year of the war, the warriors of the Shah, t Turkish garrisons, were massacred by the Mongols, t

The Kharesmian Empire at the beginning of the thirteenth century, showing the position of the other Muhammadan powers.

wnspeople—who were native Persians for the most part -driven out of the city, which was then plundered at sure.

Then the captives would be sorted out, the strong young en kept to labor at siege work in the next city, the tisans to do skilled work for the conquerors. In one case, here a Muhammadan merchant, an envoy of the Mon- ls, had been torn to pieces by the men of a town, the rrible Mongol storm was begun—the attack that is ver allowed to cease, fresh warriors taking the place of e slain, until the place was carried and its people slain th the sword or arrows.

Genghis Khan did not appear at all along the Syr. He nished from sight, taking the center of the horde with m. No one knows where he crossed the river, or where went. But he must have made a wide circle through e Red Sands desert, because he appeared out of the rrens, marching swiftly on Bokhara from the west.

Muhammad was not merely outflanked. He was in nger of being cut off from his southern armies, his son d reënforcements and the rich lands of Khorassan and rsia. While Chepé Noyon was advancing from the east, enghis Khan was moving in from the west, and the Shah Samarkand might well feel that the jaws of a trap were osing in on him.

In this predicament, he divided his main army between okhara and Samarkand, sending other of his atabegs to alkh and Kunduz. With no more than his own attendant obles, his elephants and camels and household troops, left Samarkand. And he took with him his treasure d his family, intending to return at the head of a fresh my.

In this expectation, also, he was disappointed.

Muhammad, the Warrior, called by his people a second lexander, had been thoroughly outgeneraled. The Mon- ls under the sons of the Khan, carrying fire and sword ong the Syr, had been no more than so many masks for e real attack thrust home by Chepé Noyon and Genghis han.

The Khan hastened out of the desert—so eager to make aste that he did not linger to molest the little towns in his path, and asked only water for his horses. He expect to surprise Muhammad at Bokhara; but when he arriv he learned that the Shah had fled. He was confronted one of the strongholds of Islam, the city of academies, a wall twelve leagues—so says the chronicle—in circu through which ran a fair river, lined with gardens a pleasure houses. It was garrisoned by some 20,000 Tur and a multitude of Persians, and honored by many imam and sayyid, the savants of Islam, the interpreters the Book to be Read.

It had within it a latent fire, the zeal of the devo Muhammadans, who were at present in a very mix frame of mind. The wall was too strong to be carried assault, and if the mass of the inhabitants had chosen defend it, months might have passed before the Mongo could have won a foothold upon it.

Genghis Khan had said with much truth, "The streng of a wall is neither greater nor less than the courage the men who defend it." In this case, the Turkish office chose to leave the townspeople to their fate and escape join the Shah. So they went out, with the soldiery of t Shah at night, by the water gate, and headed toward t Amu.

The Mongols suffered them to pass, but three tuma followed them and came up with them at the river. He the Turks were attacked and nearly all of them put to t sword.

Abandoned by the garrison, the elders of the city, t judges and imams, consulted together and went out face the strange Khan, yielding him the keys of the cit and receiving his promise that the lives of the inhabitan should be spared. The governor with the remaining wa riors shut himself up in the citadel, which was at onc beset by the Mongols, who shot flaming arrows into t place until the roofs of the palaces caught fire.

A flood of horsemen filled the wide streets of t city, breaking into the granaries and storehouses, st bling their horses in the libraries, to the frantic sorrow the Muhammadans who beheld more than once the sacre leaves of the Koran trodden under the hoofs of the ponie The Khan himself drew rein before an imposing building e great mosque of the city, and asked if it were the use of the emperor. He was told that it was the house Allah.

At once he rode his horse up the steps and into the osque, dismounting, and ascending to the reader's desk th its giant Koran. Here, in his black lacquer armor, and ather-curtained helmet, he addressed the assembled llahs and scholars, who had expected to behold fire scend from Heaven to blast this ungainly figure in range armor.

"I have come to this place," he said to them, "only tell you that you must find provender for my army. he countryside is bare of hay and grain, and my men e suffering from want. Open, then, the doors of your orehouses."[1]

But when the Muhammadan elders hastened from the osque they found the warriors of the Gobi already inlled in the granaries, and the horses stabled. This portion the horde had made a forced march over the desert or for too many days to linger upon the threshold of enty.

From the mosque, the Khan went to the city square here orators were accustomed to assemble an audience lecture upon matters of science or doctrine.

"Who is this man?" demanded a newcomer, of a venerble sayyid.

"Hush!" whispered the other. "It is the anger of God at descends upon us."

The Khan—a man who knew well how to address a mulude, says the chronicle—ascended the speaker's rostrum d faced the people of Bokhara. First he questioned them osely about their religion, and commented gravely that it as a mistake to make the pilgrimage to Mecca. "For the wer of Heaven is not in one place alone, but in every rner of the earth."

The old chieftain, shrewd in gauging the moods of his teners, fanned the superstitious dread of the Muhamadans. To them he appeared as a pagan devastator, an carnation of uncouth and barbaric power, a little grotesque. Bokhara had seen none but the devout within walls.

[1] This passage is almost invariably misquoted in histories, and given as follows: enghis Khan rode into the mosque and shouted to his men, 'The hay is cut—e your horses fodder.' "

"The sins of your emperor are many," he assured the
"I have come—I, the wrath and the flail of Heaven, destroy him as other emperors have been crushed. Do n give him protection or aid."

He waited for the interpreter to explain his words. T Muhammadans seemed to him to be like the Cathaya builders of cities, makers of books. Useful in furnishi him with provisions, in yielding up their wealth—in givi him information about the rest of the world; useful in g ing laborers and slaves to his men—artisans to send ba to the Gobi.

"You have done well," he went on, "in supplying army with food. Bring now to my officers the precio things you have hidden away. Do not trouble about wh is lying loose in your houses—we will take care of tha

The rich men of Bokhara were placed under guard Mongols who did not leave them, day or night. Some, suspicion that they had not brought out all their conceal wealth, were tortured. The Mongol officers called dancing girls and musicians to play Muhammadan piec Sitting gravely, wine cup in hand, in the mosques a palaces, they watched this spectacle of the entertainme of the people who lived in cities and gardens.

The garrison in the citadel held out bravely and inflict losses that angered the Mongols before the governor a his followers were cut down. When the last valuables h been retrieved from cellars and wells and dug up from t earth, the inhabitants were driven out into the plain. T Muhammadan chronicler gives us a clear glimpse of t misery of his people.

"It was a fearful day. One heard only the weeping men, women and children, who were to be separated fo ever; women were ravished by the barbarians under t eyes of those who had no resource save sorrow; some the men, rather than witness the shame of their famili rushed upon the warriors and died fighting."

Different parts of the city were fired, and the flam swept through the dry structures of wood and baked cla a pall of smoke rising over Bokhara, hiding the sun. T ptives were driven toward Samarkand, and, unable to ep up with the mounted Mongols, suffered terribly dur- g the brief march.

Genghis Khan only stayed two hours in Bokhara, has- ning on to see the Shah in Samarkand. On the way he as met by the detachments of the horde from the Syr, and s sons gave him the tidings of the capture of the cities ong the northern line.

Samarkand was the strongest of the Shah's cities. He ad started building a new wall, massive in size, about the rcuit of its gardens. But the swift advance of the Mongols und the new rampart unfinished. The old defenses were rmidable enough, including twelve iron gates flanked towers. Twenty armored elephants and one hundred nd ten thousand warriors, Turks and Persians, had been ft to guard it. The Mongols were less numerous than e garrison, and Genghis Khan made preparations for a ng siege—assembling the people of the countryside and e captives from Bokhara to aid in the work.

If the Shah had remained with his men, or if an officer ke Timur Malik had been in command, Samarkand might ell have held out as long as food lasted. But the swift nd methodical preparations of the Mongols alarmed the Muhammadans, who beheld in the distance the vast multi- ude of captives, and thought the horde much greater than was. The garrison sallied out once—was drawn on into ne of the usual Mongol ambushes—and fared badly. The sses in this battle disheartened the defenders and the mams and judges went out, on the morning the Mongols ere preparing to storm one portion of the wall, and sur- ndered the city. Thirty thousand Kankali Turks on their wn account went over to the Mongols—were received miably, given Mongol military dress and massacred a ight or two later. The Mongols would never trust the urks of Kharesm, especially those who turned traitor.

When the skilled laborers of the city had been led out the horde, and able-bodied men picked for other work, ne rest of the inhabitants were suffered to go back to eir houses. But a year or so later they were summoned the horde.

Ye Liu Chutsai writes of Samarkand, "Around the city to an extent of several scores of miles there are every where orchards, groves, flower gardens, aquaducts, runnin springs, square basins and round ponds in uninterrupte succession. Indeed, Samarkand is a delicious place."

CHAPTER XVI

THE RIDE OF THE ORKHONS

T SAMARKAND it was reported to Genghis Khan that Muhammad Shah had forsaken the city and gone south. The Mongol was determined to make the Shah captive before new armies could be raised against the invaders. He had failed to come up with the monarch of Kharesm, and now he sent for Chepé Noyon and Subotai and gave them orders.

"Follow Muhammad Shah wherever he goes in the world. Find him, alive or dead. Spare the cities that open their gates to you but take by assault those that resist. I think you will not find this as difficult as it seems."

A strange task, to hunt down an emperor through a dozen kingdoms. It was a task, indeed, for the most reckless and the most infallible of the Orkhons. They were given two tumans, twenty thousand men. With these instructions and with this cavalry division, the two Orkhons set out at once toward the south. It was then April, 1220, the Year of the Serpent.

Muhammad had gone south from Samarkand to Balkh, on the edge of the lofty ranges of Afghanistan. As usual, he vacillated. Jelal ed-Din was far off in the north, raising a new army among the warriors of the desert country near the sea of Aral. But Genghis Khan, at Bokhara, was between the Shah and this possible rallying point.

He thought of entering the Afghan country, where warlike clans awaited him. Finally, hesitating between varied counsel and his own dread, he turned due west, crossing the barrens to the mountain region of northern Persia, ar arrived at Nisapur, putting, as he thought, five hundre miles between him and the Mongol horde.

Chepé Noyon and Subotai found a strong city barri the passage of the Amu; they swam their horses acros and learned from scouts in the advance that Muhamma had forsaken Balkh. So they turned west, into the barren separating for greater protection and to obtain all possib grazing for their horses.

Every man of the two picked tumans had several horse in good condition, and the grass along the scattered strean and wells was fresh. They must have covered eighty mil a day, changing to untired horses several times during th day, and only dismounting at sunset to eat cooked foo
At the end of the barrens they encountered the rose ga dens and white walls of ancient Merv.

Satisfying themselves that the Shah could not be in th city, they galloped down to Nisapur, coming in three weel after Muhammad—who had learned of their mission, an fled on pretense of a hunting expedition. Nisapur closed i gates and the Orkhons assaulted it furiously. They faile to carry the walls but became certain that the Shah w not within its defenses.

They picked up the scent again, and headed west alon the caravan route that leads to the Caspian, scattering th remnants of the Shah's armies that had chosen this way safety from the Mongol terror. Near modern Teheran the met and defeated a Persian army, thirty thousand stron

Again they separated—all trace of the fleeing emper vanished for the moment—Subotai tending north throug the mountain region, Chepé Noyon galloping south alon the edge of the salt desert. They had passed out of Khares proper—had outrun the very tidings of their coming.

Muhammad, meanwhile, had sent away first his famil then his treasure. He left the caskets containing his jewe at a fortress—where the Mongols found them later—an decided to journey to Bagdad. To Bagdad where ruled th very Kalif with whom he had quarreled in other days. H picked up men here and there, a following of a few hu dred. He followed the great road that leads to Bagdad.

But at Hamadan the Mongols appeared at his heel
His men were scattered and ridden down, and a fe rows shot at him—the Mongols unaware of his iden-

y. He escaped and doubled back toward the Caspian.
me of his Turkish warriors grew discontented and re-llious, and Muhammad saw fit to sleep in a small tent tched beside his own. And one morning he found the npty tent filled with arrows.

"Is there no place on earth," he asked an officer, "where can be safe from the Mongol thunderbolt?"

He was advised to take ship on the Caspian and go ut to an island where he could be hidden until his sons nd atabegs could collect an army strong enough to dend him.

This Muhammad did. Disguising himself, with a few ondescript followers, he passed through the gorges, seek-g a small town on the western shore of the Caspian—a ace of fishermen and merchants, tranquil enough. But e Shah, weary and ill, deprived of his court, his slaves nd cup companions, would not sacrifice the prestige of is name. He insisted on reading the public prayers in the osque, and his identity did not long remain a secret.

A Muhammadan, who once suffered oppression at the and of the Shah, betrayed him to the Mongols who had attered another Persian army at Kasvin, and were quest-g after Muhammad through the hills. They rode into the wn that had sheltered him, as he was preparing to enter fishing skiff.

Arrows flew, but the boat drew away from the shore nd some of the nomads in their rage actually urged their orses into the water. They swam after the skiff until the rength of men and beasts gave out and they disappeared the waves.

Although they never laid hand on the Shah, they had ain him. Weakened by disease and hardship this over-rd of Islam died on his island, so poverty-ridden that is only shroud was a shirt of one of his followers.

Chepé Noyon and Subotai, the two veteran marauders ho had been ordered to capture the Shah alive or dead, id not know that he lay buried on his barren island—an-ther unfortunate who had fared no better than Wai Wang f Cathay, and Prester John himself, and Toukta Beg and utchluk. They sent back to the Khan the bulk of his treasure that the careful Subotai had gathered up, and mo of his family and word that he had sailed eastward in ship.

Genghis Khan, believing that Muhammad would t to join his son at Urgench, the city of the Khans, sent division in that direction.

But Subotai, wintering in the snow-bound pastures the Caspian, conceived the idea of marching to the nort around the sea to rejoin his Khan. He sent a courier Samarkand to ask permission to make this journey, a Genghis Khan gave his assent, sending along several tho sand Turkomans to strengthen the Orkhon's force. Subota on his own account, had been recruiting among the wi Kurds. After going south a bit to besiege and storm t important cities they had passed by in hunting down M hammad, the Mongols turned north, into the Caucasus.

They raided Georgia. A desperate struggle took pla between the Mongols and the warriors of the mountain Chepé Noyon hid himself on one side of the long valle that leads up to Tiflis, while Subotai made use of the o Mongol trick of pretended flight. The five thousand me in ambush sallied out upon the flank of the Georgian who suffered terribly in the battle.

The Mongols slashed their way through the gorges the Caucasus, and passed the Iron Gate of Alexande Emerging upon the northern slopes they found an arm of the mountain peoples—Alans, Circassians and Ki chaks mustered against them. They were outnumbere vastly, and had no way of retreat; but Subotai succeede in detaching the nomad Kipchaks from the others, and t Mongols rode through the stalwart Alans and Circassian

Then, following the Kipchaks into the salt steppes b yond the Caspian, the marauders out of Cathay scattere these wary nomads, driving them steadily north into t lands of the Russian princes.

And here they were met by a new and utterly bra foeman. The Russian warriors gathered from Kiev and t far dukedoms, eighty-two thousand of them. They mov down the Dnieper escorted by strong bands of Kipchak
They were sturdy horsemen, shield-bearers, who had wage from times forgotten a feud with the nomads of the steppe

The Mongols drew back from the Dnieper for ni

ays, watching the Russian masses, until they reached a ace selected beforehand to give battle. The northern arriors were scattered in different camps, formidable ough, but sluggish and quarreling among themselves. hey had no leader like Subotai. For two days the struggle etween Russian and Mongol—their first meeting—went n in the steppe. The great prince died under the pagan's eapons, with his nobles, and few of the host lived to scend the Dnieper again.

Left once more to their own devices, Subotai and hepé Noyon wandered down into the Crimea and stormed Genoese trade citadel. What next they might have done ere is no knowing. They were intent on crossing the nieper into Europe when Genghis Khan, who had fol-wed their movements by courier, ordered them to return a rendezvous some two thousand miles in the east.

Chepé Noyan died on the way, but the Mongols turned side long enough to invade and devastate the Bulgars ho were then on the Volga.

It was an amazing march, and probably it remains to-ay the greatest feat of cavalry in human annals. It could nly have been accomplished by men of remarkable en-urance, utterly confident in their own powers.

"Have you never heard," cries the Persian chronicler, hat a band of men from the place where the sun rises, verrode the earth to the Caspian Gates, carrying destruc-on among peoples and sowing death in its passage? Then, eturning to its master—it arrived sound and hale, loaded ith booty. And this in less than two years."

This gallop of two divisions to the end of ninety de-rees of longitude bore strange fruit. Beside the warriors ode the savants of Cathay and the Ugurs, Nestorian hristians among them. At least we hear of Muhammadan erchants with an eye for trade, who sold Christian cclesiastical manuscripts to some of the horde.

And Subotai did not ride blindly. The Cathayans and gurs noted down the positions of the rivers they crossed, nd of lakes that yielded fish—of salt mines and silver ines. Post stations were planted along the route—darogas ppointed in captured districts. With the fighting Mongol ame the administrative mandarin. A captive Armenian shop—he was kept to read and write letters for them—tells us that in the lands beneath the Caucasus, a cens was made of all men over the age of ten.

Subotai had discovered the vast pasturelands of southe Russia, the black earth region. He remembered the steppes. Years later he returned from the other side the world to overrun Moscow. And he took up his mar again where he had been called back by the Khan, cros ing the Dnieper to invade eastern Europe.

And the Genoese and Venetian merchants were broug into contact with the Mongols. A generation later t Polos, of Venice, set out for the dominion of the Gra Khan.

CHAPTER XVII

GENGHIS KHAN GOES HUNTING

WHILE THE TWO ORKHONS were raiding the west of the aspian Sea, two sons of the Khan journeyed to the other land sea, now known as the Aral. They had been sent rth to gather news of the Shah and to cut off his return. earning at length that he was in his grave, they followed e wide Amu through its clay steppes to the native city the Kharesmians.

Here the Mongols settled down to a long and bitter ege, in which—lacking large stones for their casting ma-ines, they hewed massive tree trunks into blocks and aked the wood until heavy enough for their purpose. In e hand-to-hand fighting that lasted within the walls for week, the chroniclers say they used flaming naphtha—new weapon that they must have picked up among the Muhammadans who had handled it with devastating effect gainst the crusaders of Europe. Urgench fell, and they otted back with their captives and spoil to the head-uarters of the Khan, but Jelal ed-Din, the valiant son of weak father, escaped to lead fresh forces against them.

Meanwhile Genghis Khan withdrew his warriors from e lowlands during the heat of the summer—a burning, ltry heat that distressed the men accustomed to the high titudes of the Gobi. He led them up into the cooler nges beyond the Amu.

To keep them occupied while the horse herds grazed -and with an eye to discipline—he issued an order for e favorite pastime of the horde, a season's hunt.

A Mongol hunt was no less than a regular campaig against beasts instead of men. The whole horde shared it, and its rules had been laid down by the Khan himse which means that they were inexorable.

Juchi, the Master of Hunting, being absent on duty, h lieutenant galloped off to survey and mark several hundr miles of hills. Streamers were planted for the starti points of the various regiments. Beyond the horizon t gurtai, or closing point of the hunt, was chosen and lik wise marked.

Witness then, the squadrons of the horde, in high fettl moving off to right and left, bivouacking under the orde of the hunters, waiting the arrival of the Khan and t fanfare of horns and cymbals that would start them o They were thus arranged in a shallow half circle, coveri perhaps eighty miles or so of countryside.

The Khan appearing with his higher officers, and princ and youthful grandsons, the riders mounted, forming close-knit line, sometimes two ranks deep. They carri all weapons and equipment used against human enemie with the addition of wicker shields.

The horses surged forward, the officers dropped b hind their commands, and the rousing of the animals b gan. The warriors were forbidden to use their arms again the animals, and it was a real disgrace to allow any fou footed thing to slip through the line of riders. They crush through thickets, beat up gullies and climbed hillock shouting and clamoring when a tiger or wolf was seen sli ing out of the brush.

Matters went a little harder in the night. After the fi month of the hunt, great numbers of animals were massi ahead of the half circle of humans. The warriors went in camp, lighted fires, posted sentries. There was even t usual password. Officers went the rounds. No easy matt to keep a line of pickets when all the four-footed life the mountains was astir in front of them—eyes glowi from the ground, the howling of wolves and the spitti snarl of leopards breaking through the silence.

Harder still a month later, when the circle had dra in a bit and the multitude of animals began to feel it w being driven. No relaxing the rigor of the hunt. If a f went to earth it must be dug out again with mattocks;

a bear trundled into a hole in the rocks, some one must go in after it—without injuring the bear! Many a chance here for the young warriors to show their skill and fearlessness. Especially if a solitary tusked boar—or a herd—turned and rushed the line of riders.

One part of the line encountered the wide bend of a river, and was held up. Straightway couriers were sent speeding along the half-circle of the hunters, with orders to hold back the rest of the line until the river could be crossed. The driven beasts were already over, for the most part.

The warriors urged in their horses, and slipped from the saddles, clinging to mane or tail. Some laced up their leather kits air-tight and used them as rude floats. Once on the far bank they mounted again, and the hunt went forward.

Here and there appeared the old Khan, watching the behavior of the men, and the way the officers handled them. He said nothing during the hunt, but he remembered such details.

Guided by the huntsmen, the half circle closed its wings, near the gurtai. The beasts began to feel the pressure—deer leaping into view with quivering flanks, tigers turning this way and that, heads lowered, snarling. Out of sight, beyond the gurtai, the circle was closed, tightening around the game. The brazen clamor of cymbals and the roar of shouting grew louder; the ranks formed two and three deep; the Khan, riding up to the mass of men and frantic beasts, gave a signal. The riders parted to let him through.

By old custom the Khan was to be first among the cornered beasts. He carried a bare sword in one hand, his bow in the other. It was permissible to use weapons now. The chroniclers say that he picked out the more dangerous of the brute antagonists, launching his arrows at a tiger, or reining his horse against wolves.

When he had killed several beasts, he withdrew from the ring, riding up a hill overlooking the gurtai and sitting there under a pavilion to watch the exploits of the princes and officers who next entered. It was a Mongol arena, the gladiatorial games of the nomads, and as with the gladiators of Rome not a few who entered the arena were carried from it mangled or lifeless.

When the signal for the general slaying was given, th warriors of the horde surged forward, taking what lay i their path. A whole day might pass in this slaughter o game—until the grandsons and boy princes of the hord came, as custom required, to the Khan to beg that th surviving animals should be allowed to live. This reque was granted, and the hunters turned to gather up th carcasses.

This hunting trained the warriors, and the closing i of the ring of riders was used in warfare against huma beings as well.

In this year and in an enemy country, the hunt laste no longer than four months. The Khan wished to be read for the autumn campaign, and to meet Juchi and Chata gai, returning from the inland sea with word of the deat of the Shah.

Until now the Mongols had marched almost witho interruption through Islam. They had crossed rivers, an taken cities, as swiftly as a modern traveler with servan and a caravan might pass from place to place. Muham mad, the Warrior, too ambitious in the beginning, too fea ful in the end, had abandoned his people to try to sav himself and had earned thereby only ignominy and beggar's grave.

Like the emperor of Cathay, he had thrown his armie into cities to escape the Mongol cavalry that remained in visible until the hour of battle and then maneuvered i terrible silence in obedience to the signals given by mov ing the standards—signals that were repeated to the wa riors of a squadron by the arm movements of an office This, during the day and in the din of conflict when th human voice could not be heard and cymbals and kettl drums might be mistaken for the enemy's instruments. A night such signals were given by the raising and lowerin of colored lanterns near the tugh or standard of the com mander.

After the first rush upon the northern line of the Sy Genghis Khan had concentrated his columns on what h thought to be the chief cities of the empire, Bokhara an Samarkand. He had broken this second line of defens without serious trouble, and had concentrated the hord gain in what might be called the third line—the fertile ills of northern Persia and Afghanistan.

So far the struggle between Mongol and Turk—unbeiever and Muhammadan—had been utterly disastrous for he latter. The Mongols appeared to the dismayed Turks o be an incarnation of divine wrath—in all truth, a scourge isited upon them for their sins.

Genghis Khan was at some pains to encourage this beief. He had also taken care to clear his flanks to the east, iding himself through the tablelands around the Amu eadwaters, and sending other divisions to occupy the cities n the west that Chepé Noyon and Subotai had passed by —sending back a report of them to the Khan. This done, ie had made himself master of Balkh and had devoted a ummer to the great hunt near by.

Here he occupied the trade routes in the center of the Muhammadan peoples. He had been gathering informaion all this while, and he knew now that there were forces till untouched to be dealt with, and greater powers beond the horizon. As the Chinese had done, the populaion of Islam was arming against him. Their Shah lost to hem, and two of his sons killed in battle against the Monols, they began to muster under their natural leaders, the Persian princes and the sayyids, the descendants of a warior prophet.

Genghis Khan was quite aware of his situation. He new that the real test of strength was before him—that erhaps a million men, good horsemen and exceedingly vell armed, were now ready to move against him. For the resent they lacked a leader and they were scattered hroughout a dozen kingdoms, in a circle around him.

The horde, in the beginning of this second year, could ot have numbered more than twelve tumans, somewhat nore than a hundred thousand. The Idikut of the Ugurs nd the Christian king of Almalyk had asked leave to o back to the T'ian shan with their forces, and he had iven them permission to do so. His best leaders, Chepé Noyon and Subotai were in the west, with two tumans. Tilik Noyon, the most dependable of his remaining Orkons, had been killed in the assault of Nisapur. Muhuli, f course, was occupied in Cathay. The fellowship of the

Orkhons had thinned and Genghis Khan felt the need o Subotai's counsel.

So he sent for his favorite general, all the way to th Caspian. Subotai came back to Balkh in answer to th summons, and talked for a few days with the Khan, the galloped back to his headquarters a thousand miles away

The mood of the Khan had changed and he no longe thought of hunting. He reproached his eldest son Juch angrily for the quarrel that had delayed the capture o Urgench—or perhaps for allowing Jelal ed-Din to escape
And the wayward and defiant Juchi was sent from th horde. With his household troops, he rode north into th steppes beyond the sea of Aral.

Then Genghis Khan ordered the horde forth, no longe to maneuver and pillage with half-indifferent contempt o their foes, but to destroy the man-power that existe around him.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE GOLDEN THRONE OF TULI

was living," relates the chronicle of a prince of Khorasn, "at the time in my citadel on a high and stony mountinside. It was one of the strongest of Khorassan, and—tradition is to be believed—belonged to my ancestors nce Islamism was brought into these lands. As it is near e center of the province, it served as asylum to escaped risoners and to inhabitants who fled from captivity or eath at the hands of the Tatars.

"After some time the Tatars appeared before it. When ey saw that they could not take it, they demanded as e price of their withdrawal ten thousand robes of cotton oth, and a quantity of other things—although they were ready gorged with the sack of Nesa.

"I consented to this. But when it came to carrying the nsom out to them, no one could be found to undertake because every one knew that their Khan made a prace of slaying whoever came into their hands. Finally two d men offered themselves, bringing me their children and ommending them to my care if they should lose their lives. ctually, the Tatars did slay them before leaving.

"Soon these barbarians spread all through Khorassan. hen they arrived in a district they drove before them e peasantry, and brought the captives to the city they ished to take, using them in working the siege engines. right and desolation became all-pervading. The man ho had been made captive was more tranquil than the ne who waited in his house, not knowing what his fate would be. Chieftains and nobles were obliged to go wit their vassals and war machines. Every one who did no obey was, without exception, put to the point of th sword."

It was Tuli, the youngest son of the Khan, Master o War, who thus invaded the fertile provinces of Persia. H had been ordered by his father to look for Jelal ed-Di but the Kharesmian prince evaded him, and the Mongo army marched against Merv—the jewel of the sands, th pleasure city of the Shahs. It stood on the River of Bird the Murgh Ab, and sheltered in its libraries many thou sand volumes of manuscript.

The Mongols discovered a roving column of Turkoman in the vicinity, scattered them, and Tuli made the roun of the walls with his officers, studying the defenses. Th Mongol lines were drawn up closer, the investment com pleted; the cattle of the Turkomans were turned out t graze.

Angered by the loss of a thousand of his best men—imperial guardsmen of the Khan—Tuli launched storm after storm against the wall of Merv, building an embank ment of earth against the rampart and covering his onse with flights of arrows. For twenty-two days this went on and during the lull that followed, an imam was sent out t the Mongols, who received him with all courtesy and re turned him safely to his lines.

This man of religion, it appears, had not come on beha of the city itself but on behest of the governor, a certai Merik. Reassured, the governor went forth to the Mongo tents bearing with him rich gifts of silver vessels an jeweled robes.

Tuli, a master of deceit, had a robe of honor sent t Merik, and invited him to his own tent to dine. There h convinced the Persian that he would be spared.

"Summon then thy friends and chosen companions," Tuli suggested. "I will find work for them to do, and wi honor them."

Merik dispatched a servant to bring out his intimate who were seated beside the governor at the feast. Tu then asked for a list of the six hundred richest men o Merv, and the governor and his intimates obediently wro out the names of the wealthiest landholders and merchant en, before the horrified Merik, his companions were angled by the Mongols. The list of the six hundred mes in the governor's handwriting was taken to the gate Merv by one of Tuli's officers, who demanded the persns in question.

Chinese emperor taking omen with bow

In due course, they appeared and were placed under ard. The Mongols made themselves masters of the gate, d their bands of horsemen pushed into the streets of erv. All the inhabitants were ordered out into the plain th their families and such goods as they could carry. is evacuation lasted four days.

In the midst of the multitude of captives Tuli sat watchg, from his chair on a gilded dais. His officers singled t the leaders of the Persian soldiery and brought them fore him. While the others looked on, helpless, the heads ere cut from the officers of Merv.

Then the men, women and children were separated into ree masses—the men forced to lie down, their arms ross their backs. All this unhappy multitude was dided among the Mongol warriors who strangled and ashed them to death, excepting only four hundred craftsen who were needed by the horde, and some children to kept as slaves. The six hundred wealthy inhabitants red little better—being tortured until they led the Monls to where they had hidden their most precious possessions.

The vacant dwellings were ransacked by the Mongols, e walls razed to the ground, and Tuli drew off. The only rvivors of the city, apparently, were some five thousand uhammadans who had concealed themselves in cellars d conduits, and these did not live long. Some troops of e horde returned to the city, hunted them down and left e place empty of human life.

In this fashion, one by one, sister cities were tricked and ormed. At one place some people saved themselves by ng down among the knots of bodies of those already in. The Mongols heard of this, and an order was issued cut the heads from the inhabitants in future. In the ins of another city some few score of Persians managed survive. A troop of Mongols was sent back with orders exterminate the survivors. The nomads went into camp and tracked and hunted down the miserable people with less compunction than if they had been animals.

It was, in fact, very much like the hunting of the animals. Every trick of ingenuity was called into play to root out human beings. In the ruins of one place the Mongols forced a captive muezzin to cry the summons to prayer from a minaret. The Muhammadans, lurking in their hiding places, came forth in the belief that the terrible invaders had left. They were destroyed.

When the Mongols abandoned the site of a city they trampled and burned whatever crops might be left standing so that those who escaped their swords would starve to death. At Urgench, where the long defense had made them suffer, they actually went to the trouble to dam up the river above the citadel, altering its course so it flowed over the débris of houses and walls. This changing of the course of the Amu puzzled geographers for a long time.

Such details are too horrible to dwell upon to-day. It was war carried to its utmost extent—an extent that has very nearly been approached in the Second World War. It was the slaughter of human beings without hatred—simply to make an end of them.

It made a tabula rasa of the heart of Islam. The survivors of the massacres lived on so shaken in spirit that they cared for nothing except to find food and to hide, too fearful to leave the weed grown débris, until the wolves who came to the unburied dead exterminated them or drove them away. Such sites of destroyed cities were forbidden to human beings—a scar on the face of a once fertile earth. More than once earth was plowed into the ruins, and grain planted.

The nomads, valuing human life less than the soil that could nourish grains and beasts, were eradicating the cities. Genghis Khan had paralyzed the growing movement of rebellion—had broken resistance before it could form against him. He would allow no mercy.

"I forbid you," he said to his Orkhons, "to show clemency to my enemies without an express order from me. Rigor alone keeps such spirits dutiful. An enemy conquered is not subdued, and will always hate his new master."

He had not used such measures in the Gobi, nor such utter cruelty in Cathay. Here, in the world of Islam, he showed himself a veritable scourge. He reproved Tuli bitterly for sparing the inhabitants of Herat—with the exception of ten thousand partisans of the Sultan Jelal ed-Din. And, in fact, Herat did rebel against its yoke, putting to death its Mongol governor.

Other cities flared up for a moment—when the youthful sultan visited them and harangued them. But the squadrons of the Khan were soon at their gates. The fate of Herat was not less hideous than that of Merv. The embers of resistance were stamped out in terrible fashion. For the moment a real danger had shown itself—the jihad, or holy war.

In whispers now the devout Muhammadans called the Mongols the "Accursed." The fire of frenzy died down. The men of Islam had a leader, but the center of their world lay in ruins, and Jelal ed-Din, who alone could have held them together, and taken the field against the old conqueror, was chivied around the borders by the Mongol corps of observation, and given neither time nor opportunity for assembling an army.

When the second summer came with its heat, the Khan led the greater portion of his horde up into the forested heights of the Hindu Kush, above the scorched valleys. Here he allowed them to build rest camps. The captives, nobles and slaves, judges and beggars, were set to work to raise wheat. There was no hunt this time. Sickness had taken too great a toll of the horde.

Here they could rest for a month or so in the silk pavilions of vanquished courts. The sons of Turkish atabegs and Persian amirs were their cup-bearers. The fairest women of Islam went about the camps unveiled, watched with haggard eyes by the laborers of the wheat fields, who had only the remnants of garments to cover their limbs, and must snatch their food with the dogs when the warriors ordered them to be fed.

Wild Turkomans, robbers of the caravans, came down from the heights to fraternize with the invaders and stare at the silver and gold and the endless embroidered garments that were heaped under sheds, waiting to be carried back to the Gobi. Physicians—a novelty to the nomads—were here to tend the sick, and learned men to dispute with the Cathayans while the marauders of the Gobi listened tolerantly, half understanding and little caring.

But for Genghis Khan there was the endless task of administration. Couriers came to him from the Orkhons in Cathay, and from Subotai in the Russian steppes. While he was directing military operations on these two fronts, he must keep in touch with the council of the khans in the Gobi.

Not content with messages, Genghis Khan made his Chinese councilors come to him in the Hindu Kush, and—however they may have relished the wild ride along cliff paths and over the desert beds—no one complained.

To open up these new roads between east and west, the Khan devised the yam or Mongol horse-post—the pony express of thirteenth-century Asia.

CHAPTER XIX

THE ROAD MAKERS

FOR GENERATIONS the Gobi clansmen had been accustomed to pass news from tent village to tent village by mounted messenger. When a man galloped up with a summons to war, or a bit of gossip, some one in the ordu would saddle his horse and relay the tidings to friends in the distance. These messengers were accustomed to ride fifty or sixty miles during the day.

As Genghis Khan extended his conquests, it was necessary to improve the yam. At first, like most of his expedients for government, it was purely a matter for the army. Permanent camps were made at intervals along the line of march, and a string of horses left at each, with youths to tend them, and a few warriors to keep off thieves. Where the horde had once passed, no stronger guard was necessary.

These camps—a few yurts, a shed for hay and sacks of barley in winter—were perhaps a hundred miles apart, strung along the caravan roads. Up and down this line of communication went the treasure bearers, carrying back to Karakorum the jewels, the gold ornaments, the best of the jade and enamel ware, and the great rubies of Badakshan.

Over these roads the gleanings of the horde were sent to the homeland in the Gobi. It must have been an ever-growing wonder to the nomad settlements, when each month brought its load of rarities and human beings from unknown regions. Especially when warriors who ha served in Khorassan or at the edge of the inland sea rode back to sit by the yurt fires and relate the deeds an incredible victories of their hordes.

Nothing, perhaps, seemed incredible to the dwellers a home who had grown accustomed to having treasure brought by captured camels to their tent entrances. Wha did the women think of the undreamed-of luxuries, or th old men ponder as to the ride of the Orkhons out of th world as they knew it? What became of the riches? Ho did the Mongol women make use of the pearl-sewn veil of Persia?

How greatly did the herdsmen and boys envy thes returning veterans who led strings of Arab racers, an displayed from their saddlebags the silver-worked armo of a prince or atabeg?

The Mongols have left us no record of such experiences
But we know that they accepted the victories of the Kha as a matter predestined. Was he not the Lord Bogdo, th sending from the gods, the maker of laws? Why should h not take what portion of the earth pleased him?

Genghis Khan, apparently, did not attribute his vic tories to any celestial intervention. He did say, more tha once, "There is only one sun in the sky, and one strengt of Heaven. Only one Kha Khan should be upon the earth."

The veneration of his Buddhists he accepted withou comment; he acquiesced in the rôle of the Scourge of Go bestowed upon him by the Muhammadans—he even re minded them of it when he saw something to be gained b so doing. He listened to the urging of the astrologers, bu made his own plans. Unlike Napoleon, there was nothin of the fatalist in him; nor did he assume as Alexander ha done, the attributes of a god. He set about the task o ruling half the world with the same inflexible purpose an patience he had devoted to tracking down a stray hors in his youth.

He viewed titles with a utilitarian eye. Once he ordere a letter to be written to a Muhammadan prince on his fron tier. The letter was composed by a Persian scribe who pu in all the imposing titles and flattery beloved of the Iran ians. When the missive was read over to Genghis Khan he old Mongol shouted with rage and ordered it destroyed.

"Thou hast written foolishly," he said to the scribe. "That prince would have thought I feared him."

And he dictated to another of his writers one of his customary messages, brief and peremptory, and signed "The Kha Khan."

To keep up communication between his armies, Genghis Khan knit together the old caravan routes.

Officers paused at the post stations to show their falcon tablets and to have shaggy ponies led in from the herd. Bearded Cathayans, wrapped in voluminous quilted coats, trotted up in two-wheeled curtained carts, and their servants broke off bits of the precious tea bricks to prepare over the fire. Here paused the Ugur savants—now part and parcel of the horde—in their high velvet hats and yellow cloaks thrown over one shoulder.

Past the yam station plodded the endless lines of camels of the caravans. They carried the woven stuffs and ivory and all the goods of Islam's merchants into the desert.

The yam was telegraph, railroad and parcel-post all in one. It enabled newcomers from unknown regions to seek the Mongols in the Gobi. Thin-faced Jews led along the post road their laden donkeys and carts; sallow, square-chinned Armenians rode by with a curious glance at the silent Mongol soldiers, sitting on their blankets by the fire, or sleeping under an opened tent flap.

These Mongols were masters of the roads. In the large towns, there would be a daroga, or road governor, with absolute authority in his district. With him would be a clerk, to write down the personages who called at the station, and the merchandise that went by.

The guards at the stations were so few as to be little more than an escort for the station-master. Their duties were light. Whatever they requisitioned from the countryside must be forthcoming. A Mongol had only to show himself, on his long-haired pony, with the slender lance slung over his shoulder and his lacquered armor peering from under his sable or deerskin coat—for the bystanders to hasten to him submissively. The usual petty thieves of Asia did not put in appearance. Who would dare plunder even a horse rope from a Mongol guard post, no matte how seemingly sleepy and indifferent?

At these posts halted the weary bands of Muhammada craftsmen, carpenters, musicians, brick makers, smiths sword welders, or rug weavers—captives Karakorum bound, shivering and stumbling as they crossed the waste of the inland seas, with no more than a solitary rider o the horde as guard and guide. What chance of escape ha they?

Past these posts hastened other curious bands. Yellow hat lamas, swinging their prayer wheels, their eyes fixed o remote snow summits—black hats, from the barren slope of Tibet—the smiling, slant-eyed Buddhist pilgrims, boun to spend their years in seeking the paths once followed b their Holy One. Barefoot ascetics, long-haired fakirs in different to the world about them, and gray-garbed Nes torian priests, very full of things magical but rememberin only snatches of prayer and ritual.

And often came a rider on a powerful, sweat-streake horse, scattering priests and mandarins, and crying out on word shrilly as he reined in by the yurts. This man carrie dispatches for the Khan, and he covered a hundred an fifty miles a day without rest. For him the best horse o the station was led out swiftly.

Such was the yam, and two generations later Marc Polo described it as he saw it in his journey to Kambalu which was then the city of the Khans.

"Now you must know that the messengers of the Em peror traveling from Kambalu find at every twenty-fiv miles of the journey a station which they call the Hors Post House. And at each of these stations there is a larg and handsome building for them to put up at. All th rooms are furnished with fine beds and rich silks. If ever a king were to arrive at one of these houses, he would find himself well lodged.

"At some of these stations there shall be four hundre horses, at others two hundred. Even when the messenger

[1] Khan baligh, the City of the King, Kubilai Khan, who was emperor in Marc Polo's time, resided in the Chinese capital. "Chandu" is Shandu—the "Xanadu" of Coleridge's poem.

"In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure dome decree
Where Alph the sacred river ran"—

Marco Polo relates that it took him six days' travel from Chandu to Kambalu, an his marches must have been long ones.

have to pass through a roadless tract where no hostel stands, still the stations are to be found, although at a greater interval, and they are provided with all necessaries so that the Emperor's messengers, come from what region they may, find everything ready for them.

"Never had emperor, king, or lord such wealth as this manifests. For in all these posts there are 300,000 horses kept up, and the buildings are more than 10,000 in number. The thing is on a scale so wonderful that it is hard to bring oneself to describe it.

"In this way the emperor receives dispatches from places ten days' journey off in one day and night. Many a time fruit shall be gathered at Kambalu one morning and in the evening of the next day it shall reach the Grand Khan at Chandu. The Emperor exempts these men from all tribute and pays them besides.

"Moreover there are men in these stations who, when there is a call for great haste, travel a good two hundred or two hundred and fifty miles in the day and as much in the night.[2] Every one of these messengers wears a great wide belt set all over with bells so that their bells are heard jingling a long way off. And thus on reaching the post the messenger finds another man similarly equipped who instantly takes over whatsoever he has in charge, and with it receives a slip of paper from the clerk, who is always on hand for the purpose. The clerk at each of the posts notes the time of each courier's arrival and departure.

"They take a horse from those at the station which are standing ready saddled, all fresh and in wind, and mount and go at full speed. And when those at the next post hear the bells they get ready another horse. And the speed at which they go is marvelous. By night, however, they can not go as fast as by day, because they have to be accompanied by footmen with torches.

"These couriers are highly prized; and they could never do it did they not bind hard the stomach, head and chest with strong bands. And each of them carries with him a gerfalcon tablet in sign that he is bound on an urgent express; so that if perchance his horse breaks down, he is empowered to dismount whomsoever he may fall in with on the road, and take his horse. Nobody dares refuse in such case."

[2] This is probably an error. The account given here is quoted, slightly condensed, from the Yule-Cordier edition of Marco Polo.

The post roads were the backbone of the Khan's administration. The Mongol daroga of each town naturally had the task of keeping up the string of horses, and levying supplies from the vicinity. Besides, in places not actually at war with the Khan, there was tribute to be paid to the horde. The Yassa, the Code of the Khan, became the law of the land, replacing the Koran and the Muhammadan judges. A census was taken.

Priests and preachers of every faith were exempt from the tax. So ran the Yassa. All horses taken over by the horde were branded with the mark of the owner, the Khan having a different brand.

To keep up the census rolls, and the records of the daroga, the industrious Chinese or Ugurs set up the yamen or government house. Beside the Mongol governor some dignitary of the conquered district was allowed to hold office. He served to give the Mongols information they needed, and to act as go-between.

But to a venerable sheikh in one province Genghis Khan gave a tiger tablet of authority. The sheikh could undo all the darogas did—could save the condemned from death. This shadow of authority extended by the Khan to the native rulers lightened the reign of terror. The time had not come yet, but would soon come, when the conquered peoples could invoke the Yassa as well as the Mongols. Above all things, the Mongol was consistent. After the throes of the first military occupation, he often proved a tolerant master.

But Genghis Khan spared little thought for anything except the army, the new roads, and the wealth that was flowing out of a conquered world to his people. The officers of the horde now wore the finest Turkish chain mail, and their swords were of Damascus forging. Except for his constant curiosity as to new weapons, and new knowledge, the Khan heeded little the luxury of Islam. He kept the dress and the habits of the Gobi.

He could be indulgent at times. But he was moody and intent on finishing the half completed work of conquest. His terrible flashes of temper were frequent. He made quite a favorite of a peculiarly hideous looking physician of Samarkand, who treated his eyes for him. The man, waxing bold in the Khan's tolerance, began to be something of a nuisance to the Mongol officers. He asked for a particular singing girl of beauty who had been captured in the storming of Urgench.

The Khan, amused by his insistence, ordered the girl to be given to him. The ugliness of the physician proved distasteful to the beautiful captive, and the man of Samarkand came to the Khan again, to plead that she should be made to obey him. This angered the old Mongol, who launched into a tirade on men who could not enforce obedience, and who turned traitor. Then he had the physician put to death.

In this autumn Genghis Khan had summoned the higher officers to the usual council, but Juchi, his eldest son, had not come—had sent instead a gift of horses with the explanation that he was sick.

Some of the princes of the horde disliked Juchi, held up to him the stigma of his birth, called him "Tatar." And they pointed out to the Khan that his eldest son had disobeyed the summons to the kurultai. The old Mongol sent for the officer who had brought the horses and asked whether Juchi were really sick.

"I do not know," the man from Kipchak answered, "but he was hunting when I left him."

Angered, the Khan retired to his tent, and his officers expected that he would march against Juchi, who had committed the crime of disobedience. Instead, he dictated a message to one of his writers, and gave it to a courier who started west. He was not willing to divide the horde, and very probably he hoped that his son would not rebel against him. Because he had ordered Subotai to return from Europe, and to bring Juchi to his headquarters, wherever he might be.

CHAPTER XX

THE BATTLE OF THE INDUS

THERE WAS LITTLE TIME for anything except action that eventful autumn. Herat and the other cities rose against the conquerors. Jelal ed-Din was mustering an army in the east—so messages from the corps of observation along the Hindu Kush reported. Genghis Khan was planning to send Tuli, his most dependable leader, after the Kharesmian prince, when he heard of the rising in Herat. Instead, he sent Tuli west into Khorassan with several divisions.

Genghis Khan took the field with 60,000 men to find and destroy the new Kharesmian army. He found in his path the strong city of Bamiyan in the Koh-i-Baba ranges. He settled down to invest it, sending the greater part of his forces under another Orkhon to meet Jelal ed-Din.

In due course couriers arrived at Bamiyan with word that Jelal ed-Din had 60,000 men with him—that the Mongol general had come in contact with him, and had avoided several attempts of the Kharesmians to ambush him. Scouts were watching the movements of the redoubtable prince.

What had happened was that an Afghan army had joined Jelal ed-Din in this crisis, doubling his strength. Word came in not long after that the Turks and Afghans had defeated the Mongol Orkhon, driving his men into the mountains.

Genghis Khan turned with new fury to the city before him. The defenders had laid bare all the district, even removing the large stones that could be used in siege engines. The Mongols had not the usual equipment with them and their wooden towers, raised against the walls, were fired by arrows and flaming naphtha—until the cattle were slaughtered and their hides used to cover the wood frames.

The Khan ordered an assault—the storm that is not to be abandoned until the city is taken. At this point one of his grandsons, who had followed him under the walls, was killed. The old Mongol ordered the body of the child—that he had liked for his courage—to be carried back to the tents.

He urged on the assault, and, throwing off his helmet, pushed through his ranks until he was at the head of the storming party. They gained footing in a breach, and Bamiyan fell to them not long after. Every living being was slain within its walls, and mosques and palaces pulled down. Even the Mongols spoke of Bamiyan as Moubaligh, the City of Sorrow.

But Genghis Khan left it at once to assemble his scattered divisions. They were feeling their way toward him through the hills, not much the worse for their drubbing. The Khan rallied them, and praised their devotion. Instead of blaming the unhappy Orkhon who had been worsted by Jelal ed-Din, he rode back with him over the scene of the action, asking what had happened and pointing out the mistakes he had made.

The Kharesmian prince did not prove himself as able in victory as he had been sturdy in defeat. He had his moment of exultation when his men tortured to death the Mongol prisoners and divided up the captured horses and weapons; but the Afghans quarreled with his officers and left him.

Genghis Khan was on the march against him, after detaching an army to watch the movements of the Afghans. Jelal ed-Din retreated east to Ghazna, but the Mongols were hard after him. He sent messengers to summon new allies, but these found that the Mongols had guarded the mountain passes. With his thirty thousand men Jelal ed-Din hurried down through the foothills and out upon the valley of the Indus.

His hope was to cross the river and league himself with the sultans of Delhi. But the Mongols, who had been five days behind him at Ghazna, were now within half a day's ride. Genghis Khan had barely allowed his men to dismount to cook their food.

Ancient Chinese war chariot

Desperate now, the Kharesmian prince hastened to the river, found that he had come to a place where the Indus was too swift and deep for the crossing, and turned at bay, his left flank protected by a mountain ridge, his right by a bend of the river.

The chivalry of Islam, hunted out of its own lands, prepared to measure its strength against the inexorable Mongol. Jelal ed-Din ordered all the boats along the bank to be destroyed, so his men would not think of fleeing. His position was strong, but he must hold it or be annihilated.

At dawn the Mongols advanced all along the line. They had emerged out of the darkness in formation, Genghis Khan with his standard, and the ten thousand cavalry of the imperial guard in reserve behind the center. These, at first, were not engaged.

The impetuous Kharesmian prince was the first to send his men forward. His right wing—always the strongest division in a Muhammadan army of that day—under Emir Malik skirmished with the left of the Khan, and drove home a charge along the bank of the Indus that forced the Mongols back at this point. They scattered into squadrons as usual, reformed under one of the Khan's sons, and were forced back again.

On their right, the Mongols had been checked by the barrier of the lofty and barren ridges, and here they halted. Jelal ed-Din detached forces from this part of his line to aid the advancing right wing of Emir Malik. And later in the day he withdrew still more squadrons from the defenders of the mountain to strengthen his center.

Determined to risk everything in one cast of fortune, he charged with the élite of his host, straight into the Mongol center, cutting through to the standard, seeking the Khan. The old Mongol was not there. His horse had been killed under him and he had mounted another and gone elsewhere.

It was a moment of apparent victory for the Kharesmian, and the ululation of the Muhammadans rose above the din of beating hoofs, the grinding of steel, and the cries of the wounded.

The Mongol center, badly shaken by the charge, kept on fighting stubbornly. Genghis Khan had noticed the withdrawal of nearly all the Kharesmian left wing, posted on the heights. He ordered a tuman commander, Bela Noyon, to go with the guides he had been questioning and to cross the mountain at all costs. It was the old turning movement of the Mongols, the standard-sweep.

The noyon with his men followed the guides into sheer gorges and ascended cliff paths that seemed impassable. Some of the warriors fell into the chasms, but the greater part gained the ridge late in the day and descended on the remnant of men left by Jelal ed-Din to protect this point. Over the mountain barrier the Kharesmian flank was turned. Bela Noyon charged into the enemy camp.

Meanwhile Genghis Khan had taken the leadership of his ten thousand heavy cavalry, and had gone—not to the menaced center, but to the defeated left wing. His charge against Emir Malik's forces routed them. Wasting no time in following them up, the Khan swung his squadrons about and drove them against the flank of Jelal ed-Din's troops of the center. He had cut off the wing by the river from the Kharesmian prince.

The stout hearted but wearying Muhammadans had been rendered helpless by the sagacity of the old Mongol, and by maneuvering as perfect as the final moves of a checkmate. And the end came swiftly, inexorably. Jelal ed-Din made a last and hopeless charge against the horsemen of the guard and tried to withdraw his men toward the river. He was followed up, his squadrons broken; Bela Noyon pressed in upon him, and when he gained the steep bank of the Indus at last, he had around him no more than seven hundred followers.

Realizing that the end had come, he mounted a fresh horse, rid himself of his armor, and with only his sword and bow and a quiver of arrows, he forced his charger over the edge of the bank, plunging into the swift current, and making for the distant shore.

Genghis Khan had given orders that the prince was to be taken alive. The Mongols had drawn in upon the last Kharesmians and the Khan lashed his horse through the fighting to watch the rider he had seen leap from the twenty-foot bank. For a while he gazed in silence at Jelal ed-Din. Putting his finger to his lips he uttered an ungrudged exclamation of praise.

"Fortunate should be the father of such a son!"

Though he could admire the daring of the Kharesmian prince, he did not intend to spare Jelal ed-Din. Some of his Mongols wished to try to swim after their foeman, but the Khan would not allow this. He watched Jelal ed-Din reach the far bank, in spite of current and waves. The next day he sent a tuman in pursuit where the river could be crossed, giving this task to Bela Noyon, the same officer who had led a division over the cliff paths to the Kharesmian camp.

Bela Noyon ravaged Multan and Lahore, picked up the trail of the fugitive, but lost him among the multitudes upon the way to Delhi. The oppressive heat astonished the men from the Gobi plateau and the noyon turned back at length, saying to the Khan:

"The heat of this place slays men, and the water is neither fresh nor clear."

So India—all except this northern segment—was spared the Mongol conquest. Jelal ed-Din survived, but his moment had passed. He fought against the horde again, but as a partisan, an adventurer without a country.

The battle of the Indus was the last stand of the Kharesmian chivalry. From Tibet to the Caspian Sea resistance had ceased, and the survivors of the peoples of Islam had become the slaves of the conqueror. And with the end of warfare, as in Cathay, the thoughts of the old Mongol turned to his homeland.

"My sons will live to desire such lands and cities as these," he said, "but I cannot."

He was needed in far Asia. Muhuli had died after binding more firmly the Mongol yoke upon the Chinese; in the Gobi the council of the khans was restless and bickering; in the kingdoms of Hia rebellion smoldered. Genghis Khan led his horde up the Indus. He knew that Hia, on the far slopes of Tibet, could be no more than eight hundred miles distant, when he entered the long valleys of Kashmir. But, as Alexander had done before him, he found the road blocked by the massifs of impenetrable ranges. Wiser than Alexander in his disappointment, he turned back without hesitation and set out to retrace his steps around the Roof of the World, to the caravan route that he had opened in his invasion.

He stormed Peshawar and route-marched back to Samarkand. In the spring of 1220 he had first seen the walls and gardens of Samarkand, and now, in the fall of 1221 his task under the Roof of the World had ended.

"It is time," the sage Ye Liu Chutsai agreed, "to make an end of slaying."

When the horde left the last ruins of the south behind them the Khan gave the accustomed order to put to death all captives, and in this way perished the unhappy multitude that had followed the nomads. The women of Muhammadan monarchs, who were to be taken to the Gobi, were placed at the roadside to wail the last sight of their native land.

For a moment, it seems, the old Mongol pondered the meaning of his conquests.

"Dost thou think," he asked a savant of Islam, "that the blood I have shed will be remembered against me by mankind?" He recalled the higher wisdom of Cathay and Islam that he had tried to understand, and had dismissed incuriously. "I have pondered the wisdom of the sages. I see now I have slain without knowledge of what to do rightly. But what care I for such men?"

To the refugees gathered in Samarkand, who came out to meet him in fear, bringing gifts, he was kind. He talked with them, explained anew the shortcomings of their late Shah, who had neither known how to keep his promise nor defend his people. He appointed governors from among them and extended to them what might be called suffrage in the Mongol dominion—a share in the protection of the Yassa. These people would be ruled, before very long, by his sons.

The conqueror was feeling the bite of old wounds, and seemed to understand that his time in the world was approaching its end. He wished to have things in order—rebellion quenched, the Yassa enforced, and his sons in authority.

He sent out over the post roads a summons to all high officers to attend a great council on the river Syr, near the spot where he had first entered Kharesm.

CHAPTER XXI

THE COURT OF THE PALADINS

THE PLACE CHOSEN for the gathering was a meadow seven leagues in circuit,—a place ideal to a Mongol's thinking because water fowl filled the marshes by the river; golden pheasants flitted through the lush grass. Abundant grazing —game to be hunted over the downs. The time was early spring, the customary month of the kurultai.

And, punctual to the summons, the leaders of the hordes began to arrive. Only the industrious Subotai, recalled from Europe, was a little late.

They came in from all the quarters of the four winds, Eagles of the empire, generals from far frontiers, roving tar-khans, subject kings and ambassadors. They had journeyed far to this Camelot of the nomad peers. And they brought with them no mean retinue. The kibitkas from Cathay were drawn by matched yokes of oxen and covered with silk. On their platforms fluttered captured banners.

The officers from the slopes of Tibet had their covered wagons gilded and lacquered, drawn by lines of ponderous, long-haired yaks with wide horns and silky white tails —animals greatly prized by the Mongols. Tuli, Master of War, coming up from Khorassan, brought with him strings of white camels. Chatagai, descending from the snows of the ranges, drove in a hundred thousand horses. They were clad, these officers of the hordes, in cloth-of-gold and silver, covered with sable coats, and wraps of silver-gray wolfskin to protect their finery.

From the T'ian shan came the Idikut of the Ugurs, th most cherished of all allies, and the Lion King of the Chris tian folk—broad-faced Kirghiz chieftains coming to rende their allegiance to the conqueror—long-limbed Turkoman in stately robes.

The horses, instead of weather-stained leather, wer barded in jingling chain mail, their harness bright with po ished silver work and afire with jewels.

From the Gobi appeared a much-prized youngste Kubilai, the son of Tuli, now nine years old. He had bee allowed to join in his first hunt, an important event fo this grandson of an emperor. Genghis Khan with his ow hand completed the ceremony of initiation.

The leaders of the hordes now gathered in the kurult place, a white pavilion so large that it sheltered two thou sand men. It had one entrance to be used by no one excep the Khan; the warriors bearing shields at the great entranc facing south were merely a routine guard mount. So rigi was discipline in the hordes, and so firmly established wa the routine of the empire that no unauthorized person ver tured within the quarters of the conqueror.

As they had once brought to the Khan captured horse and women and weapons in the Gobi, the chiefs of th hordes and the subject kings now offered him their gifts o a new sort, the best of the treasure gleaned carefully fro half the earth. "Never," says the chronicler, "was suc splendor seen before."

Instead of mare's milk, the princes of the empire ha mead of honey and the red and white wines of Persia. Th Khan himself admitted a fondness for the wines of Shira

He sat now in the gold throne of Muhammad that h had brought with him from Samarkand; beside it reste the scepter and crown of the dead emperor of Islam. Whe the council gathered, the mother of the Shah was led i chains on her wrists. But under the throne was placed square of gray felt woven out of animal hair, as a symbo of his old authority in the Gobi.

To the assembled leaders out of the east, he recounte the campaigns of the last three years. "I have gained grea mastery," he said gravely, "by virtue of the Yassa. Live y in obedience to the laws."

The shrewd Mongol wasted no words in boasting of h achievements; the thing to be gained was obedience to the law. He no longer needed to advise and lead his officers in person. They were able to wage war on their own account, and he saw clearly the grave danger of a division among them. To emphasize the extent of his conquests, he had all the visiting ambassadors ushered to the throne one by one.

To his three sons he spoke a word of warning. "Do not allow quarrels to come between you. Be faithful and unfailing to Ogotai."

After that there was feasting for a month in the kurultai, and to this concourse came two most welcome guests. Subotai rode in from the borderland of Poland, bringing with him Juhci.

Juchi, the first-born, had been sought out by the veteran Orkhon who persuaded him to attend the council and to face his father again. So Juchi appeared before the Khan and knelt to press his hand to his forehead. The old conqueror, who was deeply attached to Juchi, was gratified —though he made no display of affection. The conqueror of the steppes had brought as a gift to his sire a hundred thousand Kipchak horses. Disliking the court, Juchi asked for permission to return to the Volga, and this was granted him.

The concourse broke up, Chatagai riding back to his mountains, and the other hordes taking the trail to Karakorum. The chronicler relates that every day of the journey, Genghis Khan summoned Subotai to come to his side and relate his adventures in the western world.

CHAPTER XXII

THE END OF THE TASK

GENGHIS KHAN was not destined to spend his last years in his homeland. All had been prepared for his sons but two things. Two hostile powers still survived in the world as the old Khan knew it—the troublesome king of Hia down Tibet-way, and the ancient Sung in southern China. He passed a season at Karakorum among his people with Bourtai at his side, and then he was in the saddle again. Subotai was sent to invade the lands of the Sung, and Genghis Khan took upon himself the task of quelling the desert clans of Hia forever.

This he did. Marching in winter through frozen swamps, he found his foes of other days drawn up to receive him —remnants of Cathayans, armies of western China, Turks and all the forces of Hia. The chronicle gives us a glimpse of the grim pageant of destruction—fur-clad Mongols fighting across the ice of a river, the allies, seemingly victorious, charging en masse upon the veterans of the Khan's center, the heart of the horde. Three hundred thousand men may have perished here.

And then the aftermath. Tricked, shaken, and hunted down, the remaining warriors of the allies fleeing. All men capable of bearing arms put to death in the path of the horde. The king of Hia, escaped to a mountain citadel, guarded by snow-drifted gorges, sending his submission to the inexorable Khan, hiding his hatred and despair under the mask of friendship, asking that the past be forgotten.

"Say to your master," Genhis Khan replied to the envoys, "that I have no wish to remember what is past. I will hold him in friendship."

But the Khan would not make an end of war. There were the people of the Sung to be humbled, as the allies had been. The horde marched in mid-winter toward the boundaries of ancient China. Ye Liu Chutsai, the sage, dared to protest against the annihilation of the Sung.

"If these people be slain, how then will they aid thee, or make wealth for thy sons?"

The old conqueror pondered, remembering perhaps that after he had made deserts of once populous lands the sages of Cathay had helped to keep things in order. He answered unexpectedly, "Be thou, then, master of subject peoples—serve thou my sons faithfully."

He would not forego the military conquest of the Sung. That must be finished, to the end. He kept his saddle and led his armies across the Yellow River. Here the Khan learned of the death of Juchi in the steppes, He said that he wished to be alone in his tent, and he grieved heavily in silence for his first-born.

Not long since, when Ogotai's little son had been slain beside him at Bamiyan, the Khan had commanded the bereaved father not to show sorrow. "Obey me in this thing. Thy son is slain. I forbid thee to weep!"

Nor did he himself show outwardly that the death of Juchi troubled him. The hordes went forward, the routine was as usual, but the Khan spoke less with his officers and it was noticed that the tidings of a fresh victory near the Caspian failed to rouse him, or to draw either comment or praise from him. When the horde entered a dense fir forest where snow lay still in the shadows, although the sun was warm, he gave command to halt.

He ordered couriers to ride swiftly to his nearest son, Tuli, who was camped not far away. When the Master of War, now a man grown, dismounted at the yurt of the Khan, he found his father lying upon a carpet near the fire, wrapped in felt and sable robes.

"It is clear to me," the old Mongol greeted the prince, "that I must leave everything and go hence from thee."

He had been sick for some time, and this sickness he knew now, was draining away his life. He ordered to his side the general officers of the horde, and while they knelt with Tuli, listening intently to his words, he gave them clear directions how to carry on the war against the Sung that he had begun but could not finish. Tuli, especially, was to take over all lands in the east, as Chatagai was to do in the west, while Ogotai must be supreme over them, the Kha Khan at Karakorum.

Like the nomad he was, he died uncomplaining, leaving to his sons the greatest of empires and the most destructive of armies, as if his possessions had been no more than tents and herds. This was in the year 1227, the year of the Mouse in the cycle of the Twelve Beasts.

The chronicle tells us that Genghis Khan made provision in his last illness for the destruction of the Hia king, his old foeman, who was then on his way to the horde. The Khan commanded that his death be kept secret until this could be done.

A spear was thrust, point in the earth, before the white yurt of the conqueror which stood apart from the rest of the camp. The astrologers and sages who came to wait upon the Khan were kept without by guards, and only the high officers came and went through the entrance, as if their leader were indisposed and giving orders from his bed. When the Hia monarch and his train reached the Mongols, the visitors were invited to a feast, given robes of honor and seated among the officers of the horde. Then they were slain, to a man.

Deprived of Genghis Khan, awe-struck at the death of the seemingly invincible man who had made them masters of all they could desire, the Orkhons and princes of the horde turned back to escort the body to the Gobi. Before burial it must be shown to his people and carried to the abiding place of Bourtai, the first wife.

Genghis Khan had died in the lands of the Sung, and to prevent his foemen from discovering the loss of the Mongols, the warriors escorting the death car cut down all the people they met until they reached the edge of the desert. There the men of the horde, the veterans of long warfare, mourned aloud as they rode beside the funeral car.

To them it seemed incredible that the great Khan should have ceased to go before the standard, and that they were no longer to be sent hither and yon at his will.

"O lord bogdo," cried a gray-haired tar-khan, "wilt thou leave us thus? Thy birth-land and its rivers await thee, thy fortunate land with thy golden house surrounded by thy heroes await thee. Why hast thou left us in this warm land, where so many foemen lie dead?"

Others took up the mourning as they crossed the bed of the barrens. In this way the chronicler has written down their lament:

"Aforetime thou didst swoop like a falcon; now a rumbling car bears thee onward.

O my Khan!

"Hast thou in truth left thy wife and children, and the council of thy people?

O my Khan!

"Wheeling in pride like an eagle, once thou didst lead us; but now thou hast stumbled and fallen,

O my Khan."

The conqueror was brought home, not to Karakorum, but to the valleys where he had struggled for life as a boy, to the heritage that he would not desert. The couriers of the hordes mounted and galloped off into the prairies, bearing word to the Orkhons and princes and the distant generals that Genghis Khan was dead.

When the last officer had come in and dismounted at the death yurt, the body was taken to its resting place—most probably to the forest he himself had selected. No one knows the exact burial place. The grave was dug under a great tree.

The Mongols say that a certain clan was exempted from military duty and charged to watch the site, and that incense was burned unceasingly in the grove until the surrounding forest grew so thick that the tall tree was lost among its fellows and all trace of the grave vanished.

Part Four

AFTERWORD

TWO YEARS PASSED IN MOURNING. During these two years Tuli remained in Karakorum as regent, and at the end of the appointed time the princes and generals journeyed back into the Gobi, to select the new Kha Khan, or emperor, in obedience to the wishes of the dead conqueror.

They came as monarchs in their own right—the right of heritage, by the will of Genghis Khan. Chatagai, the harsh tempered—now the eldest son—from Central Asia and all the Muhammadan lands: Ogotai, the good humored, from the Gobi plains: Batu, the "Splendid," the son of Juchi, from the steppes of Russia.

They had grown from youth to manhood as Mongol clansmen; now they were masters of portions of the world, with its riches, that they had not known existed. They were Asiatics, raised among barbarians; every one of the four had a powerful army at his summons. They had tasted the wine of luxury in their new dominions. "My descendants," Genghis Khan had said, "will clothe themselves in embroidered gold stuffs; they will nourish themselves with meats, and will mount splendid horses. They will press in their arms young and fair women, and they will not think of that to which they owe all these desirable things."

Nothing was more natural than that they should have quarreled and gone to war over their heritage. It was almost inevitable, after those two years—especially in the case of Chatagai, who was now the eldest, and entitled by Mongol custom to claim the khanship. But the will of the dead conqueror had been impressed upon all this multitude. The discipline established by an iron hand still held them bound together. Obedience—fidelity to their brothers—and end of quarreling—the Yassa itself!

Many times Genghis Khan had warned them that their dominion would vanish and they themselves be lost if they did not agree. He had understood that this new empire could be held together only by submission to the authority of one man. And he had chosen not the warlike Tuli, or the inflexible Chatagai, but the generous and guileless Ogotai as his successor. Keen understanding of his sons had dictated this choice. Chatagai would never have submitted to Tuli, the youngest; and the Master of War would not long have served his harsh elder brother.

When the princes assembled at Karakorum, Tuli, the Ulugh Noyon, Greatest of Nobles, resigned his regency, and Ogotai was asked to accept the throne. The Master of Council refused, saying it was not fitting for him to be honored above his uncles and elder brother. Either because Ogotai was obstinate or because the soothsayers were unfavorable, forty days passed in uncertainty and anxiety. Then the Orkhons and elder warriors waited upon Ogotai and spoke to him angrily. "What doest thou? The Khan himself hath chosen thee for his successor!"

Tuli added his voice—repeated the last words of his father, and Ye Liu Chutsai, the sage Cathayan, master of the treasury, used all his wit in averting a possible calamity. Tuli, troubled, asked the astrologer-minister if this day were not unfavorable.

"After this," responded the Cathayan at once, "no day will be favorable."

He urged Ogotai to mount without delay to the gold throne on the felt-covered dais, and as the new emperor was doing so, Ye Liu Chutsai went to his side and spoke to Chatagai.

"Thou art the elder," he said, "but thou art a subject. Being the elder, seize this moment to be the first to prostrate thyself before the Throne."

An instant's hesitation and Chatagai threw himself down before his brother. All the officers and nobles in the council pavilion followed his example, and Ogotai was acknowledged Kha Khan. The throng went out and bent their heads to the south, toward the sun, and the multitude of the camp did likewise. Then followed days of feasting. The treasure that Genghis Khan had left, the riches gathered from all the corners of unknown lands, was given to the other princes, the officers and Mongols of the army.[1] Ogotai pardoned all men accused of wrong-doing since the death of his father. He reigned tolerantly for a Mongol of that day, and heeded the advice of Ye Liu Chutsai,[2] who labored with heroic fortitude to consolidate the empire of his masters on the one hand, and to restrain, on the other hand, the Mongols from further annihilation of human beings. He dared oppose the terrible Subotai at a time when the Orkhon—who was carrying on war in the lands of the Sung with Tuli—wished to massacre the inhabitants of a great city. "During all these years in Cathay," the wise chancellor argued, "our armies have lived upon the crops and the riches of these people. If we destroy the men, what will the bare land avail us?"

Ogotai conceded the point and the lives of a million and a half Chinese who had flocked into the city were spared. It was Ye Liu Chutsai who put the tribute gathering in regular form—one head of cattle for every hundred from the Mongols, and a certain sum in silver or silk from every family of Cathay. He argued Ogotai into appointing lettered Cathayans to high office in the treasury and administration.

"To make a vase," he suggested "thou dost avail thyself of a potter. To keep accounts and records, learned men should be used."

"Well," retorted the Mongol, "what hinders thee from making use of them?"

While Ogotai built himself a new palace, Ye Liu Chutsai established schools for young Mongols. Five hundred wagons drove in each day to Karakorum, now known as Ordubaligh, the Court City. These carts brought provisions, grains and precious goods to the storehouses and treasury of the emperor. The rule of the desert khans was firmly fastened upon half the world.

Unlike the empire of Alexander, the dominion of the Mongol conqueror remained intact after his death. He had made the Mongol clans obedient to one ruler; he had given them a rigid code of laws, primitive, but well adapted to [1] A legend exists that forty fair young women in jeweled garments and forty fine stallions were taken to the grave of Genghis Khan and there slain.

[2] See notes on Ye Liu Chutsai and Ogotai.

his purpose and during his military overlordship he had laid the foundations for the administration of the empire. In this last task, Ye Liu Chutsai was of priceless aid.

Perhaps the greatest heritage the conqueror left his son was the Mongol army. By his will, Ogotai, Chatagai and Tuli divided up his main horde—his personal army, as it might be called. But the system of mobilization, of training and maneuvering in war remained as Genghis Khan had formed it. Moreover, in Subotai and others, the sons of the conqueror had veteran generals quite equal to the task of extending the empire.

He had instilled into his sons and his subjects the idea that the Mongols were the natural masters of the world and he had so broken the resistance of the strongest empires that the completion of the work was a comparatively simple matter for them—and Subotai. It might be called mopping up after the first advance.

In the early years of Ogotai's reign a Mongol general, Charmagan, defeated Jelal ed-Din and put an end to him forever—and consolidated the regions west of the Caspian such as Armenia. At the same time Subotai and Tuli advanced far south of the Hoang Ho and subdued the remnants of the Chins.

In 1235 Ogotai held a council, and it resulted in the second great wave of Mongol conquest. Batu, first Khan of the Golden Horde, was sent with Subotai into the west to the sorrow of Europe as far as the Adriatic and the gates of Vienna.[3] Other armies took the field in Korea, China and southern Persia. This wave withdrew upon the death of Ogotai in 1241—Subotai being again wrenched back by the inflexible summons from his goal, Europe.

The ten years that followed were full of cross-currents, the growing feud between the house of Chatagai and that of Ogotai—the brief appearance of Kuyuk, who may or may not have been a Nestorian Christian, but who ruled through Christian ministers, one of them the son of Ye Liu Chutsai, and who had a chapel built before his tent. Then the rule passed from the house of Ogotai to the sons of Tuli—Mangu and Kubilai Khan. And the third and most extensive wave of conquests swept the world.

[3] See note on Subotai in Europe.

Hulagu, the brother of Kubilai, aided by Subotai's son, invaded Mesopotamia, took Bagdad and Damascus—breaking forever the power of the Kalifates—and came almost within sight of Jerusalem. Antioch, held by the descendants of Christian crusaders, became subject to the Mongols, who entered Asia Minor as far as Smyrna, and within a week's march of Constantinople.

At almost the same time Kubilai launched his armada against Japan, and extended his frontiers down to the Malay states, and beyond Tibet into Bengal. His reign (1259 to 1294) was the golden age of the Mongols.[4] Kubilai departed from the customs of his fathers, moved the court to Cathay, and made himself more a Chinese in habits than a Mongol. He ruled with moderation and treated his subject peoples with humanity. Marco Polo has left us a vivid picture of his court.

But the change of the court to Cathay was an omen of the break-up of the central empire. The Il-khans of Persia, —Hulagu's descendants, who reached their greatest power under Ghazan Khan about 1300—were at too great a distance from the Kha Khan to be in touch with him. Besides, they were fast becoming Muhammadans. Such, also, was the situation of the Golden Horde up Russia-way. Kubilai's Mongols were being converted to Buddhism. Religious and political wars followed the death of this grandson of Genghis Khan. The Mongol empire dissolved gradually into separate kingdoms.

About 1400 a Turkish conqueror, Timur-i-lang (Tamerlane) brought together the central Asia and Persian fragments, and trounced the Golden Horde founded by Batu the son of Juchi.

Until 1368 the Mongols remained masters of China, and it was 1555 before they lost their last strongholds in Russia to Ivan Grodznoi (the Terrible). Around the Caspian Sea their descendants, the Uzbegs, were a power under Shaibani in 1500, and drove Babar, the Tiger, a descendant of Genghis Khan, into India, where he made himself the first of the great Moghuls.

It was the middle of the eighteenth century, six hun-

[4] "He ruled over a wider extent than any Mongol or indeed any other sovereign. He was the first to govern by peaceful means. The splendor of his court and the magnificence of his entourage easily surpassed that of any Western ruler."—The Cambridge Medieval History, Vol. IV, 645.

dred years after the birth of Genghis Khan, before the last scions of the conqueror relinquished their strongholds. Then, in Hindustan, the Moghuls[5] gave way to the British, the Mongols in the east yielded to the armies of the illustrious Chinese emperor, K'ien lung.

The Tatar khans of the Crimea became the subjects of Catherine the Great at the same time that the unfortunate Kalmuk or Torgut horde evacuated its pastures on the Volga and started the long and dreadful march eastward to its former home—a march vividly pictured by De Quincey in his Flight of a Tatar Tribe.

A glance at a map of Asia in the mid-eighteenth century will show the final refuge of the nomad clansmen, descendants of the horde of Genghis Khan. In the vast spaces between stormy Lake Baïkul and the salt sea of Aral—barely charted in the maps of that day, and marked vaguely "Tartary" or "Independent Tartary"—in the ranges of the mid-continent, they wandered from summer to winter pasture, living in their felt yurts, driving their herds—Karaïts, Kalmuks and Mongols, utterly unaware that through these same valleys Prester John of Asia had once fled to his death, and the yak-tail standard of Genghis Khan had advanced to terrify the world.

In this fashion ended the Mongol empire, dissolving into the nomad clans from which it had sprung, leaving remnants of peaceful herdsmen where warriors had once massed.

The brief and terrible pageant of the Mongol horsemen has passed almost without trace. The desert city of Karakorum is buried under the sand waves of the barrens; the grave of Genghis Khan lies hidden somewhere in a forest near one of the rivers of his birth-place; the riches he gathered from his conquest were given to the men that served him. No tomb marks the burial place of Bourtai, the wife of his youth. No Mongol literati of his day gathered the events of his life into an epic.

His achievement is recorded for the most part by his enemies. So devastating was his impact upon civilization that virtually a new beginning had to be made in half the world. The empire of Cathay, of Prester John, of Black [5] Moghuls—so the first Europeans to visit India pronounced the word Mongol.

Cathay, of Kharesm, and—after his death—the Kalifate of Bagdad, of Russia, and for a while the principalities of Poland ceased to be. When this indomitable barbarian conquered a nation all other warfare came to an end. The whole scheme of things, whether sorry or otherwise, was altered, and among the survivors of a Mongol conquest peace endured for a long time.

The blood-feuds of the grand princes of ancient Russia —lords of Twer and Vladimir and Susdal, were buried under a greater calamity. All these figures of an elder world appear to us only as shadows. Empires crumbled under the Mongol avalanche, and monarchs fled to their death in wild fear. What would have happened, if Genghis Khan had not lived, we do not know.

What did happen was that the Mongol, like the Roman peace, enabled culture to spring up anew. Nations had been shuffled to and fro—or rather the remnants of them—Muhammadan science and skill carried bodily into the far east, Chinese inventiveness and administrative ability lugged into the west. In the devastated gardens of Islam scholars and architects enjoyed, if not a golden, a silver age under the Mongol Il-khans; and the thirteenth century was notable in China for its literature, especially plays, and its magnificence—the century of the Yuan.

When political coherence began again after the retreat of the Mongol hordes, something very natural but quite unexpected happened. Out of the ruins of the warring Russian princedoms emerged the empire of Ivan the Great, and China, united for the first time by the Mongols, appeared as a single dominion.

With the coming of the Mongols and their foes the Mamluks, the long chapter of the crusades ended. For a while under Mongol overlordship, Christian pilgrims could visit the Holy Sepulcher in safety, and Muhammadans the temple of Solomon. For the first time the priests of Europe could venture into far Asia, and venture they did, looking about them in vain for the old Man of the Mountain who had harried the crusaders, and the kingdoms of Prester John and Cathay.

In this vast shaking up of human beings, perhaps the most vital result was the destruction of the growing power of Islam. With the host of Kharesm disappeared the main military strength of the Muhammadans, and with Bagdad and Bokhara the old culture of the Kalifs and imams. Arabic ceased to be the universal language of scholars in half the world. The Turks were driven west and one clan, the Othmans (Ottomans, so called) became in time the masters of Constantinople. A red hat lama, called out of Tibet to preside at the coronation of Kubilai, brought with him out of his mountains the hierarchy of the priests of Lhassa.

Genghis Khan, the destroyer, had broken down the barriers of the Dark Ages. He had opened up roads. Europe came into contact with the arts of Cathay. At the court of his son, Armenian princes and Persian grandees rubbed shoulders with Russian princes.

A general reshuffling of ideas followed the opening of the roads. An abiding curiosity about far Asia stirred Europeans. Marco Polo followed Fra Rubruquis to Kambalu. Two centuries later Vasco da Gama set forth to find his way by sea to the Indies. Columbus sailed to reach not America but the land of the Great Khan.

Notes

I

THE MASSACRES

THE GRIM PAGEANTRY of death that appeared in the tracks of the Mongol horsemen has not been painted in continuous detail in this volume. The slaughter that cast whole peoples into death-throes is well depicted in the general histories of the Mongols, written by Europeans, Muhammadans and Chinese. Little allusion is made here to such scenes of carnage as the blotting out of Kiev, the Court of the Golden Heads, as the Mongols called the ancient Byzantine citadel with its gilt domes. Here the torturing of old people, the ravishing of younger women, and the hunting down of children ended in utter desolation that was rendered more ghastly by the following pestilence and famine. The effluvia of festering bodies was so great that even the Mongols avoided such places and named them Mou-baligh, City of Woe.

The student of history will find vital significance in this unprecedented maiming and subsequent rebuilding of human races. The impact of the Mongols, brought about by Genghis Khan, has been well summed up by the authors of the Cambridge Medieval History.

"Unchecked by human valor, they were able to overcome the terrors of vast deserts, the barriers of mountains and seas, the severities of climate, and the ravages of famine and pestilence. No dangers could appall them, no stronghold could resist them, no prayer for mercy could move them. . . . We are confronted with a new power in history, with a force that was to bring to an abrupt end as a deus ex machina, many dramas that would otherwise have ended in a deadlock, or would have dragged on an interminable course."

This "new power in history"—the ability of one man to alter human civilization—began with Genghis Khan and ended with his grandson Kubilai, when the Mongol empire tended to break up. It has not reappeared since.

In this volume no effort has been made to apologize for or to further drench with blood, the character of Genghis Khan. Allowance has been made for the fact that most of our knowledge of the conqueror has been based, in the past, upon the accounts given by medieval Europeans, Persians and Syrians, who with the Chinese proper were the greatest victims of Mongol destructiveness. Cæsar wrote his own memoirs of the Gallic conquest, and Alexander had his Arrian and Quintus Curtius.

We find in Genghis Khan—when we look at the man in his own environment—a ruler who did not put to death any of his sons, ministers or generals. Both Juchi and Kassar his brother, gave him some occasion for cruelty, and he might have been expected to execute the Mongol officers who allowed themselves to be defeated. Ambassadors from all peoples came to him and returned safely. Nor do we find that he tortured captives except in unusual circumstances.

The warlike and kindred nations, the Karaïts, Ugurs and Liao-tung—the Men of Iron—were dealt with leniently, as were the Armenians, Georgians and the remnants of the crusaders by his descendants. Genghis Khan was careful to preserve what he thought might be useful to himself and his people; the rest was destroyed. As he advanced farther from this homeland, into strange civilizations, this destruction became almost universal.

We moderns are beginning to understand how this unprecedented annihilation of human life and works earned for him the vituperation of Muhammadans. Just as his unexampled genius gained for him the veneration of his Buddhists.

Because Genghis Khan did not, like Muhammad the prophet, make war on the world for a religion, or—like Alexander and Napoleon—for personal and political aggrandizement, we have been mystified. The explanation of the mystery lies in the primitive simplicity of the Mongol's character.

He took from the world what he wanted for his sons and his people. He did this by war, because he knew no other means. What he did not want he destroyed, because he did not know what else to do with it.

II

THE LAWS OF GENGHIS KHAN

1. "It is ordered to believe that there is only one God, creator of heaven and earth, who alone gives life and death, riches and poverty as pleases Him—and who has over everything an absolute power.

2. Leaders of a religion, preachers, monks, persons who are dedicated to religious practice, the criers of mosques, physicians and those who bathe the bodies of the dead are to be freed from public charges.

3. It is forbidden under penalty of death that any one, whoever he be, shall be proclaimed emperor unless he has been elected previously by the princes, khans, officers and other Mongol nobles in a general council.

4. It is forbidden chieftains of nations and clans subject to the Mongols to hold honorary titles.

5. Forbidden to ever make peace with a monarch, a prince or a people who have not submitted.

6. The ruling that divides men of the army into tens, hundreds, thousands, and ten thousands is to be maintained. This arrangement serves to raise an army in a short time, and to form the units of commands.

7. The moment a campaign begins, each soldier must receive his arms from the hand of the officer who has them in charge. The soldier must keep them in good order, and have them inspected by his officer before a battle.

8. Forbidden, under death penalty, to pillage the enemy before the general commanding gives permission; but after this permission is given the soldier must have the same opportunity as the officer, and must be allowed to keep what he has carried off, provided he has paid his share to the receiver for the emperor.

9. To keep the men of the army exercised, a great hunt shall be held every winter. On this account, it is forbidden any man of the empire to kill from the month of March to October, deer, bucks, roe-bucks, hares, wild ass and some birds.

10. Forbidden, to cut the throats of animals slain fo food; they must be bound, the chest opened and the hea pulled out by the hand of the hunter.
11. It is permitted to eat the blood and entrails of anima —though this was forbidden before now.
12. (A list of privileges and immunities assured to th chieftains and officers of the new empire.)
13. Every man who does not go to war must work fo the empire, without reward, for a certain time.
14. Men guilty of the theft of a horse or steer or a thin of equal value will be punished by death and their bodie cut into two parts. For lesser thefts the punishment shall b according to the value of the thing stolen, a number o blows of a staff—seven, seventeen, twenty-seven, up t seven hundred. But this bodily punishment may be avoide by paying nine times the worth of the thing stolen.
15. No subject of the empire may take a Mongol fo servant or slave. Every man, except in rare cases, mu join the army.
16. To prevent the flight of alien slaves, it is forbidde to give them asylum, food or clothing, under pain of deat Any man who meets an escaped slave and does not brin him back to his master will be punished in the sam manner.
17. The law of marriage orders that every man sha purchase his wife, and that marriage between the first an second degrees of kinship is forbidden. A man may marr two sisters, or have several concubines. The women shou attend to the care of property, buying and selling at the pleasure. Men should occupy themselves only with huntin and war. Children born of slaves are legitimate as th children of wives. The offspring of the first woman shall b honored above other children and shall inherit everythin
18. Adultery is to be punished by death, and those guil of it may be slain out of hand.
19. If two families wish to be united by marriage an have only young children, the marriage of these childre is allowed, if one be a boy and the other a girl. If th children are dead, the marriage contract may still b drawn up.
20. It is forbidden to bathe or wash garments in runnin water during thunder.

21. Spies, false witnesses, all men given to infamous vices, and sorcerers are condemned to death.
22. Officers and chieftains who fail in their duty, or do not come at the summons of the Khan are to be slain, especially in remote districts. If their offense be less grave, they must come in person before the Khan."

These examples of the laws of Genghis Khan are translated from Pètis de la Croix, who explains that he has not been able to come upon a complete list of the laws—a "Yassa Gengizcani." He has gleaned these twenty-two rulings from various sources, the Persian chroniclers, and Fras Rubruquis and Carpini. The list given is palpably incomplete, and has come down to us from alien sources.

The explanation of the curious tenth law may probably be found in existing religious prejudices as to the manner of killing game to be eaten. The eleventh rule seems to aim at preserving a possible source of food in time of famine. The twentieth law concerning water and thunder is explained by Rubruquis—to prevent the Mongols, who were very much afraid of thunder, from throwing themselves into lakes and rivers during a storm.

Pètis de la Croix says that the Yassa of Genghis Khan was followed by Timur-i-lang. Babar, the first of the Moghuls (Mongols) of India, says: "My forefathers and family had always sacredly observed the rulers of Chengiz. In their parties, their courts, their festivals and their entertainments, their sitting down and rising up, they never acted contrary to the institutions of Chengiz."—Memoirs of Babar, Emperor of Hindustan—Erskine and Leyden edition, 1826, p. 202.

III

PRESTER JOHN OF ASIA

IN THE MIDDLE OF THE TWELFTH CENTURY reports reached Europe of the victories of a Christian monarch of Asia over the Turks—"Iohannes Presbyter Rex Armeniæ et Indiæ." Later-day research assures us that this first inkling of a Christian king east of Jerusalem came from tidings of victories gained over the Muhammadans by John, high Constable of Georgia, in the Caucasus,— region then vaguely associated with both Armenia an India.

It was recalled that the three Magi had emerged fro this region; the crusading spirit flamed in Europe an stories of an all-powerful Christian potentate in far As gained greatly in the telling. The Nestorian Christian scattered from Armenia to Cathay, saw fit to indite an send to the Pope Alexander III a letter purporting to b from Prester John describing vast splendor and many wo ders in the medieval manner—processions over the dese an entourage of seventy kings, fabulous beasts, a city upo sands. In short, a pretty good summary of the myths the day.

B·t so far as there existed truth in the description, fitted Wang Khan (pronounced by the Nestorians Un Khan, or "King John") of the Karaïts, who were large Christians. His city of Karakorum might be termed th stronghold of the long-neglected Nestorians of Asia. It wa a desert city, and he was an emperor, having khans or kin for subjects. Various chronicles mention the conversion a king of the "Keriths." Marco Polo found in Wang Kha the actor of the shadowy rôle of Prester John.[1]

IV

THE NUMERICAL STRENGTH OF THE MONGOL HORDE

IT IS A COMMON and quite natural mistake among hi torians to describe the Mongol army as a vast multitud Even Dr. Stanley Lane-Poole, one of the most disti guished of modern authorities, cannot resist the inevitab bi nehaiet and speaks of "Chingkiz Khan followed b hordes of nomads like the sands of the sea without nu ber."—Turkey (Stories of the Nations).

In our understanding of the Mongols we have advanc sufficiently far beyond the ideas of Matthew Paris and t medieval monks to be certain that the horde of Gengh Khan was not, like the Huns, a migratory mass, but disciplined army of invasion. The personnel of the horde is given by Sir Henry Howorth as follows:

[1] See Yule-Cordier. Travels of Marco Polo, I, 230-237. Also Baring-Gould's My of the Middle Ages.

Imperial Guards	1,000
The Center, under Tuli.....	101,000
Right Wing	47,000
Left Wing	52,000
Other Contingents.....	29,000
	230,000

This is apparently the make-up of the army at the time of the war against the Shah and the west. It is, therefore, the largest assembled by Genghis Khan. The other contingents consisted of the 10,000 Cathayans, and the forces of the Idikut of the Ugurs, and the Khan of Almalyk—the last two being sent back after the invasion began.

The brilliant scholar, Leon Cahun, maintains that an army of Mongol effectives did not number over 30,000. There being three such army corps in this campaign—besides Juchi's 20,000 and the allies—the host would amount to some 150,000 warriors by this calculation. And certainly no greater numbers could have existed for a winter in the barren valleys of high Asia.

The army commanded by Genghis Khan at the time of his death is known to have consisted of four corps with the imperial guard—some 130,000 men. Turning to the scanty figures available as to the populations of the Gobi lands, we can approximate the total at no more than 1,500,000 souls. From this number no more than 200,000 effectives could very well be mustered. Brigadier General Sir Percy Sykes, in his Persia, comments on the "Mongols who were numerically weak and fought thousands of miles from their base."

Contemporary Muhammadan chroniclers habitually exaggerated the numbers of the horde, mentioning five hundred to eight hundred thousand. But all available evidence indicates that Genghis Khan performed during the years 1219-1225, the remarkable military feat of subjecting the country from Tibet to the Caspian Sea, with no more than 100,000 men—and from the Dnieper to the China Sea with no more than 250,000, in all. And of this number probably not more than half were Mongols. The chronicle mention 50,000 Turkoman allies at the end of the cam paigns; Juchi's forces were augmented by throngs of th wild Kipchak, the Desert People. In China the ancestor of the present-day Koreans and Manchus were fightin under the Mongol standards.

In the reign of Ogotai, the son of Genghis Khan, mor of Turkish tribes of mid-Asia joined the Mongols, wh gave them their fill of fighting. These made up the greate part of the army with which Subotai and Batu conquere eastern Europe. Certainly, Ogotai had more than a millio effective fighting men in his armies, and Mangu and Ku bilai, grandsons of Genghis Khan, double that number.

V

THE MONGOL PLAN OF INVASION

THE HORDE OF GENGHIS KHAN followed a fixed plan in i vading a hostile country. This method met with unvaryin success until the Mongols were checked by the Mamluk in their advance upon Egypt across the Syrian desert abou 1270.

1. A kurultai, or general council, was summoned the headquarters of the Kha Khan. All higher officers e cept those given permission to remain on active servic were expected to attend the council. Here the situation wa discussed, and the plan of the campaign explained. Route were selected, and the various divisions chosen for servic

2. Spies were sent out, and informers brought in to b questioned.

3. The doomed country was entered from sever points at once. The separate divisions or army corps eac had its general commanding, who moved toward a fixe objective. He was at liberty to maneuver, and to engag the enemy at his discretion, but must keep in touch b courier with headquarters—the Khan or Orkhon.

4. The separate divisions posted corps of observatio before the larger fortified towns, while the neighborin district was ravaged. Supplies were gathered off the cou try and a temporary base established if the campaign w to be a long one. Seldom did the Mongols merely scre a strong city; they were more apt to invest it—a tuman or two remaining behind with captives and engines for siege work, while the main force moved on.

When faced by a hostile army in the field, the Mongols followed one of two courses. If possible, they surprised the enemy by a rapid march of a day and a night—two or more Mongol divisions concentrating at the place of battle at a given hour, as in disposing of the Hungarians near Pesth in 1241. If this did not succeed, the enemy would be surrounded, or the Mongols would envelop one flank, in the swift tulughma, or "standard sweep."

Other expedients were to feign flight and withdraw for several days until the hostile forces became scattered or off their guard. Then the Mongols would mount fresh horses and turn to attack. This maneuver brought disaster to the powerful Russian host near the Dnieper.

Often in this deceptive retreat they would extend their line until the enemy was surrounded without realizing it. If the hostile troops massed together and fought bravely, the Mongol enveloping line would open, allowing them to retreat. They would then be attacked on the march. This was the fate of the Bokharan army.

Many of these expedients were practiced by the resourceful early Turks, the Hiung-nu, from whom the Mongols themselves were descended in part. The Cathayans were accustomed to maneuver in cavalry columns, and the Chinese proper knew all the rules of strategy. It remained for Genghis Khan to supply the inflexible purpose and the rare ability to do the right thing at the right time—and to hold his men under iron restraint.

"Even the Chinese said that he led his armies like a god. The manner in which he moved large bodies of men over vast distances without an apparent effort, the judgment he showed in the conduct of several wars in countries far apart from each other, his strategy in unknown regions, always on the alert yet never allowing hesitation or overcaution to interfere with his enterprises, the sieges he brought to a successful termination, his brilliant victories, a succession of 'suns of Austerlitz,' all combined, make up the picture of a career to which Europe can offer nothing that will surpass, if indeed she has anything to bear comparison with it"—so Demetrius Boulger sums up the military genius of the great Mongol. (A Short History o China, p. 100.)

VI

SUBOTAI BAHADUR vs. MIDDLE EUROPE

THE TEST OF STRENGTH between Mongol and Europea did not come during the lifetime of Genghis Khan. It fol lowed the great council of 1235, in the Khanship o Ogotai.

Briefly, this is what happened:

Batu, the son of Juchi, marched west with the Golde Horde to take possession of the lands galloped over b Subotai in 1223. From 1238 to the autumn of 1240 Batu the "Splendid," overran the Volga clans, Russian citie and the steppes of the Black Sea, finally storming Kiev an sending raiding columns into southern Poland, or rathe Ruthenia, since Poland was then divided into a number o principalities.

When the snows melted in March, 1241, the Mongo headquarters was north of the Carpathians between moder Lemberg and Kiev. Subotai, the directing genius of th campaign, was confronted by the following enemies:

In front of him Boleslas the Chaste, overlord of Poland had assembled his host. Beyond, to the north, in Silesia Henry the Pious was gathering an army 30,000 strong o Poles, Bavarians, Teutonic Knights and Templars out o France, who had volunteered to repel this invasion of bar barians. A hundred miles or so behind Boleslas, the kin of Bohemia was mobilizing a still stronger army, receivin contingents from Austria, Saxony and Brandenburg.

On the left front of the Mongols, Mieceslas of Galici and other lords were preparing to defend their lands in th Carpathians. On the Mongol left, farther away, the Magya host of Hungary, a hundred thousand strong, was mus tering under the banner of Bela IV, the king, beyond th Carpathian mountains.

If Batu and Subotai turned south into Hungary, the would have left the Polish army at their rear; if they ad vanced due west, to meet the Poles, the Hungarians woul be on their flank.

Subotai and Batu seem to have been perfectly well aware of the preparations of the Christian hosts. Their scouting expeditions of the previous year had brought them valuable information about the country and the monarchs opposed to them. On the other hand the Christian kings had little knowledge of the movements of the Mongols.

Batu acted as soon as the ground was dry enough for his horses to move over—in spite of the marshes along the Pripet and the damp forests that fringed the Carpathian ranges. He divided his host into four army corps, sending the strongest, under two reliable generals, grandsons of Genghis Khan, Kaidu and Baibars, against the Poles.

This division moved rapidly west and encountered the forces of Boleslas as the Poles were pursuing some scouting contingents of Mongols. The Poles attacked with their usual bravery and were defeated—Boleslas fleeing into Moravia and the remnants of his men withdrawing to the north, whither the Mongols did not pursue them. This was March 18. Cracov was burned, and the Mongols of Kaidu and Baibars hastened on to meet the Duke of Silesia before he could join forces with the Bohemians.

They encountered this army of Henry the Pious near Liegnitz, April 9. Of the battle that followed we have no first hand account. We only know that the German and Polish forces broke before the onset of the Mongol standard, and were almost exterminated; Henry and his barons died to a man, as did the Hospitalers. It is said that the grand master of the Teutonic Knights perished on the field, with nine Templars and five hundred men-at-arms.[1]

Liegnitz was burned by its defenders, and the day after the battle Kaidu and Baibars and their division confronted the larger army of Wenceslas, king of Bohemia, fifty miles away. Wenceslas moved slowly from place to place, as the Mongols appeared and disappeared. His cumbersome array, too strong to be attacked by the Mongol division, could not come up with the horsemen from Cathay, who rested their mounts and ravaged Silesia and beautiful Moravia

[1] "Tartarin ont la terre qui fu Henri le duc de Poulainne destruite et escillie, et celui meismes ocis avec mout des barons, et six de nos freres et trois chevaliers et deux sergans et 500 de nos hommes ont mort."—Letter of the Grand Master of the French Templars to Saint Louis, quoted by Leon Cahun.

Legend has it that the Mongols cut an ear from every dead foeman, and filled in this manner nine sacks that they carried back to Batu, their prince. The head of the unfortunate Henry was carried on a lance to Liegnitz.

under his eyes, and finally tricked Wenceslas into marching north while they turned south to rejoin Batu.

"And know," Ponce d'Aubon wrote to St. Louis of France, "that all the barons of Germany and the king, and all the clergy and those in Hungary have taken the Cross to go against the Tatars. And, if what our brothers have told us is true, if it happens by the will of God that they be vanquished, these Tatars will not find any one to stand against them as far as your land."

But when the Master of the Templars wrote this, the Hungarian host was already vanquished. Subotai and Batu threaded through the Carpathians in three divisions, the right flank entering Hungary from Galicia, the left, under command of Subotai, swinging down through Moldavia. The smaller armies in their path were wiped out, and the three columns joined forces before Bela and his Hungarians near Pesth.

It was then the beginning of April, just before the battle of Liegnitz. Subotai and Batu had not heard how matters were going in the north; they dispatched a division to open communication with the grandsons of Genghis Khan on the Oder.

The small army of the bishop of Ugolin advanced against them; they retreated to a marshy region and surrounded the rash Hungarians. The bishop fled with three companions, sole survivors.

Meanwhile Bela began to cross the Danube with his host—Magyars, Croats and Germans, with the French Templars who had been posted in Hungary. A hundred thousand in all. The Mongols retreated slowly before them, at a hand pace. Batu, Subotai, Mangu—conqueror of Kiev—had left the army and were inspecting the site chosen for the battle. This was the plain of Mohi, hemmed in on four sides, by the river Sayo, by the vine-clad hills of Tokay, by "dark woods and the great hills of Lomnitz."

The Mongols retreated across the river, leaving intact a wide stone bridge, and pushing into the brush on the far side for some five miles. Blindly the host of Bela followed, and camped in the plain of Mohi. Camped with its heavy baggage, its sergeants-at-arms, its mailed chivalry and followers. A thousand men were posted on the far side of the bridge, and explored the woods without seeing a sign of the enemy.

Night. Subotai took command of the Mongol right, led it in a wide circle back to the river where he had observed a ford. He set to work building a bridge to aid in the crossing.

The break of dawn. Batu's advance moved back toward the bridge, surprised and annihilated the detachment guarding it. His main forces were thrown across, seven catapults playing on Bela's knights who tried to stem the rush of horsemen across the bridge. The Mongols surged steadily into the disordered array of their foes, the terrible standard with its nine yak-tails surrounded by the smoke of fires carried in pans by shamans. "A great gray face with a long beard," one of the Europeans described it, "giving out noisome smoke."

No doubting the bravery of Bela's paladins. The battle was stubborn and unbroken until near mid-day. Then Subotai finished his flank movement, and appeared behind Bela's array. The Mongols charged in, broke the Hungarians. Like the Teutonic Knights at Liegnitz, the Templars died to a man on the field.[2]

Then the Mongol ranks parted in the west, leaving open the road through the gorge by which the host of Bela had advanced to the plain. The Hungarians fled, and were pursued at leisure. For two days' journey the bodies of Europeans strewed the roads. Forty thousand had fallen. Bela separated from his remaining followers, leaving his brother dying, the Archbishop slain. By sheer speed of his horse he freed himself from the pursuit, hid along the bank of the Danube, was hunted out and fled into the Carpathians. There, in time, he reached the same monastery that sheltered his brother-monarch of Poland, Boleslas the Chaste.

The Mongols stormed Pesth, and fired the suburbs of Gran. They advanced into Austria as far as Nieustadt, avoided the sluggish host of Germans and Bohemians, and turned down to the Adriatic, ravaging the towns along the coast except Ragusa. In less than two months they had overrun Europe from the headwaters of the Elbe to the sea, had defeated three great armies and a dozen smaller ones and had taken by assault all the towns except Olmutz which made good its defense under Yaroslav of Sternberg with twelve thousand men.

[2] "Magister vero Templarius cum tota acie Latinorum occubuit."—Thomas de Spalato, cited by Leon Cahun.

No second Tours saved western Europe from inevitable disaster.[3] Its armies, capable only of moving in a mass, led by reigning monarchs as incompetent as Bela or Saint Louis of France, were valiant enough but utterly unable to prevail against the rapidly maneuvering Mongols led by generals such as Subotai and Mangu and Kaidu—veterans of a lifetime of war on two continents. But the war never came to a final issue. A courier from Karakorum brought the Mongols the tidings of Ogotai's death and a summons to return to the Gobi.

At the council there a year later, the battle of Mohi had a curious aftermath. Batu accused Subotai of being tardy in arriving on the field and causing the loss of many Mongols. The old general made answer tartly:

"Remember that the river was not deep before thee, and a bridge was already there. Where I crossed, the river was deep and I had to build a bridge."

Batu admitted the truth of this, and did not blame Subotai again.

VII

WHAT EUROPE THOUGHT OF THE MONGOLS

ENOUGH, perhaps, has been said here to show that the Mongol armies possessed several advantages over the Europeans of that day. They were more mobile—Subotai rode with his division two hundred and ninety miles in less than three days during the invasion of Hungary. The same Ponce d'Aubon makes the comment that the Mongols could march in a single day as far "as from Chartres to Paris."

"No people in the world," asserts a contemporary

[3] A summary of this campaign—which has been much discussed and little understood—can be found in Henri Cordier's Mélanges d'Histoire et de Géographie Orientales, Tome II; also in Sir Henry Howorth's History of the Mongols, Vol. I. Fuller details are given in Leon Cahun's Introduction a L'Histoire de L'Asie pp. 359-374 and in Der Einfall der Mongolen in Mittel Europa by Strakosch-Grassman.

chronicler of Europe,[1] speaking of the Mongols, "is as able—especially in conflicts in open country—in defeating an enemy either by personal bravery, or by knowledge of warfare."

This opinion is confirmed by Fra Carpini, who was sent to the Mongol Khan not long after the terrible invasion of 1238-1242, to exhort the pagan conquerors to cease the slaughter of Christian peoples. "No single kingdom or province can resist the Tartars." And he adds: "The Tartars fight more by stratagem than by sheer force."

This daring priest—who seems to have had an eye for things military—remarks that the "Tartars" were less numerous and lacked the physical stature and strength of the Europeans. And he goes on to urge European monarchs—who always took command of their hosts in a war, no matter how lacking they might be in the qualifications of such leadership—to model their military system on the Mongol.

"Our armies ought to be marshaled after the order of the Tartars, and under the same rigorous laws of war. The field of battle ought to be chosen, if possible in a plain where everything is visible on all sides. The army should by no means be drawn up in one body, but in many divisions. Scouts ought to be sent out on every side. Our generals ought to keep their troops day and night on the alert, and always armed, ready for battle; as the Tartars are always vigilant as devils.

"If the princes and rulers of Christendom mean to resist their progress, it is requisite that they should make common cause and oppose them with united council."

Carpini did not fail to notice the weapons of the Mongols and advised the European soldiery to improve their arms. "The princes of Christendom ought to have many soldiers armed with strong-bows, cross-bows and artillery which the Tartars dread. Besides these, there ought to be men armed with good iron maces, or with axes having long handles. The steel arrow-heads should be tempered in the Tartar manner by being plunged, while hot, into water mixed with salt, that they may be better able to penetrate armor. Our men ought to have good helmets and armor of proof for themselves and horses. And those who ar not so armed, ought to keep in the rear of those who are.

[1] Thomas de Spalato, cited by Leon Cahun.

Carpini had received a vivid impression of the devastat ing archery of the Mongol children of war. "Men and horse they wound and slay with arrows, and when men an mounts are shattered in this fashion, they then close i upon them."

At this time the emperor Frederick II—the same wh waged the famous feud with the Pope—called for ai from the other princes, and wrote to the king of England "The Tartars are men of small stature but sturdy limbs— high-strung, valiant and daring, always ready to thro themselves into peril at a sign from their commander . . But—and this we can not say without sighing—formerl they were covered with leather and armor of iron plate while now they are equipped with finer and more usefu armor, the spoils taken from Christians so that we may b shamefully and dolorously slain with our own weapon Moreover, they are mounted on better horses, they sustai themselves on choicer foods and wear garments less rud than our own."

VIII

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE EUROPEAN MONARCH AND THE MONGOLS

After Batu and Subotai withdrew from Europe in 124 a widespread dread of another Mongol invasion impelle the sovereigns of Christendom to action in various way Innocent IV called the Council of Lyons to discuss, amon other matters, some safeguard for Christianity. Heedles St. Louis declared that if the "Tartars" appeared again, th chivalry of France would die in the defense of the churc Whereupon, he started off on the disastrous crusades int Egypt, sending at various times priests and messages t the Mongols south of the Caspian, commanded at that tim by Baichu Khan.

One of his embassies was forwarded to the Khan Karakorum with an amusing result. Joinville, a mediev chronicler, tells us that when the envoys were presented with their slight gifts, the Khan turned to the nobles gathered around him and said: "Lords, here is the submission of the King of the Franks, and here is the tribute he has sent us."

The Mongols frequently urged Louis to make submission to their Khan, to give tribute and be protected as other rulers were, by the power of the Khan. They advised also, that he make war on the Seljuks in Asia Minor, with whom they were then engaged. Louis some years later sent the lusty and intelligent Rubruquis to the court of the Khan, but was careful to instruct the monk not to present himself as an envoy, or to let his journey be construed as an act of subjection.

Among the letters that reached Louis from the horde was one mentioning the fact that many Christians were to be found among the Mongols. "We have come with authority and power to announce that all Christians are to be freed from servitude and taxes in Muhammadan lands, and are to be treated with honor and reverence. No one is to molest their goods and those of their churches which have been destroyed are to be rebuilt and are to be allowed to sound their plates."[1]

It is true that there were several Christian wives of the Mongol Il-khans of Persia, and that Christian Armenians served them as ministers. Remnants of the crusaders abandoned in Palestine fought at times in the Mongol ranks. And the Il-khan Arghun did rebuild churches that had been destroyed in the previous wars.

And an angered Muhammadan wrote that in the year 1259 the Mongol Il-khan Hulagu commanded that in the whole of Syria "Every religious sect should proclaim its faith openly, and that no Moslem should disapprove. On that day there was no single Christian of the common people or of the highest who did not put on his finest apparel."[2]

Whatever may have been their leaning toward the Christians in Palestine, the Mongol leaders did sincerely desire the aid of European armies against the Muhammadans, and in 1274 sent an embassy of sixteen men to the Pope, and then to Edward I of England who answered with a good deal of casuistry—since he had no intention of faring toward Jerusalem: "We note the resolution you have taken to relieve the Holy Land from the enemies of Christianity. This is most grateful to us, and we thank you. But we cannot at present send you any certain news about the time of our arrival in the Holy Land."

[1] Howorth, History of the Mongols, Part III.

[2] An Answer to the Dhimmis.—Richard Gottheil, "Journal of the American Oriental Society," Dec., 1921.

Meanwhile the Pope sent other envoys to Baichu near the Caspian. These offended the Mongols very much because they did not know the name of the Khan and because they lectured the pagans on the sin of shedding blood. The Mongols said that the Pope must be very ignorant if he did not know the name of the man who ruled all the world, and as for slaughtering their enemies, they did that at the command of the son of Heaven himself. Baichu was minded to execute the unfortunate priests, but spared them and sent them back safely because they were, after all, envoys.

The reply of Baichu, given in a letter to these emissaries of Innocent IV, is worth quoting:

"By order of the supreme Khan, Baichu Noyon sends these words—Pope, dost thou know that thine envoys have come to us with thy letters? Thine envoys have uttered big words. We know not whether they did so by thine order. So, we sent thee this message. If thou desirest to reign over the land and water, thy patrimony, thou must come thyself, Pope, to us, and present thyself before him who reins over the surface of all the earth. And if thou comest not, we know not what will happen. God knows. Only, it would be well to send messengers to say whether thou wilt come or no, and whether thou wilt come in friendship or no."[8]

Needless to say, Innocent IV did not make the journey to Karakorum. Nor did the Mongols return again to middle Europe. But there is no indication that the armed chivalry of western Europe restrained them. At Nieustadt in Austria they had advanced nearly six thousand miles from their homeland. Subotai and the fierce Tuli died. Batu, the son of Juchi, was well content with Sari, his golden city on the Volga. Civil war smoldered along the wastes of Asia, and the westward march of the hordes came to an end. They ravaged Hungary again near the close of the thirteenth century, then retired to the plains of the Volga.

[8] From the Speculum Historiale of Vincent de Beauvais. In this letter appears again the ominous phrase, "We know not what will happen. God knows"—the usual phrase of warning when the Mongols meant war. To the Seljuk prince, Kai Kosru, they returned a laconic answer. "Thou hast spoken bravely. God will give victory as He pleases." It seems that they always sent envoys to an enemy, after the custom of Genghis Khan, offering terms. If these were refused, they uttered their warning and made ready for war.

IX

THE GRANDSON OF GENGHIS KHAN IN THE HOLY LAND

A LITTLE-KNOWN CHAPTER of history is the contact of the Mongols with the Armenians and the Christians of Palestine after the death of Genghis Khan. Hulagu, his grandson, brother of Mangu who was then Khan, took over the dominion of Persia, Mesopotamia and Syria in the middle of the thirteenth century. What followed is well summarized in the Cambridge Medieval History, Vol. IV, p. 175.

"After more than a century's experience the Armenians could not trust their Latin[1] neighbors as allies. Haithon (king of the Armenians) put his trust not in the Christians but in the heathen Mongols, who for half a century were to prove the best friends Armenia ever had.

"At the beginning of Haithon's reign the Mongols . . . did good service to the Armenians by conquering the Seljuks. Haithon made an offensive and defensive alliance with Baichu the Mongol general[2] and in 1244 became the vassal of the Khan Ogotai. Ten years later he did homage in person to Mangu Khan and cemented the friendship between the two nations by a long stay at the Mongol court.

"The rest of his reign was filled with a struggle against the Mamluks, whose northward advance was fortunately opposed by the Mongols. Haithon and Hulagu joined forces at Edessa to undertake the capture of Jerusalem from the Mamluks."

[1] The crusading barons who still maintained their fiefs in the Holy Land, notably Bohemond of Antioch.

[2] Bachu in the text, as also Hethum, Ogdai, etc. The spelling has been altered to conform with the other chapters of this book. Baichu is often confused with Batu, who was a grandson of Genghis Khan, and the first ruler of the Golden Horde in Russia.

X

YE LIU CHUTSAI, SAGE OF CATHAY

FEW MEN have had a more difficult part to play in life than this young Cathayan who caught the eye of Genghis Khan. He was one of the first Chinese philosophers to ride with the horde, and the Mongols did not make matters easy for the student of philosophy and astronomy and medicine. An officer who was noted for his skill as a maker of bows chaffed the tall and long-bearded Cathayan:

"What business has a man of books," he asked, "among a fellowship of warriors?"

"To make fine bows," Ye Liu Chutsai replied, "a wood worker is needed; but when it comes to governing an empire, a man of wisdom is needed."

He became a favorite of the old conquerer and during the long march into the west, while the other Mongols were gathering rich spoil, the Cathayan collected books and astronomical tables and herbs for his own use. He noted down the geography of the march, and when an epidemic seized the horde, he enjoyed a philosopher's revenge on the officers who had made sport of him. He dosed them with rhubarb and cured them.

Genghis Khan valued him for his integrity, and Ye Liu Chutsai lost no opportunity to check the slaughter that marked the path of the horde. There is a legend that in the defiles of the lower Himalayas Genghis Khan saw in his path a marvelous-appearing animal, shaped like a deer but green in color and with only a single horn. He called Ye Liu Chutsai for an explanation of the phenomenon and the Cathayan made answer gravely:

"This strange animal is called Kio-tuan. He knows every language of the earth, and he loves living men, and has a horror of slaying. His appearance is undoubtedly a warning, O my Khan, to thee to turn back from this path."

Under Ogotai, the son of Genghis Khan, the Cathayan practically administered the empire, and managed to take the infliction of punishment from the hands of Mongol officers, appointing magistrates to this duty, and tax gatherers to the care of the treasures. His quick wit and quiet courage pleased the pagan conquerors, and he knew how to influence them. Ogotai was a heavy drinker, and Ye Liu Chutsai had reason to wish him to live as long as possible. Remonstrances having no effect upon the Khan, the Cathayan brought him an iron vase in which wine had been standing for some time. The wine had corroded the edge of the vessel.

"If wine," he said, "has eaten thus into iron, judge for yourself what is has done to your intestines."

Ogotai was struck by the demonstration and moderated his drinking—though it was the real cause of his death. Once, angered at an act of his councilor, he had Ye Liu Chutsai thrown into prison, but changed his mind later and ordered him to be freed. The Cathayan would not leave his cell. Ogotai sent to find out why he did not appear at court.

"Thou didst name me thy minister," the sage sent back his response. "Thou hast placed me in prison. So, I was guilty. Thou hast set me at liberty. Thus, I am innocent. It is easy for thee to make game of me. But how am I to direct the affairs of the empire?"

He was restored to office, to the great good of millions of human beings. When Ogotai died, the administration was taken out of the hands of the old Cathayan and given to a Muhammadan named Abd el Rahman. Grief over the oppressive measures of the new minister hastened the death of Chutsai.

Believing that he must have accumulated great riches during his life under the Khans, some Mongol officers searched his residence. They found no other treasure than a regular museum of musical instruments, manuscripts, maps, tablets and stones on which inscriptions had been carved.

XI

OGOTAI AND HIS TREASURE

THE SON who succeeded to the throne of the conqueror found himself an almost unwilling master of half the world.

Ogotai had all a Mongol's good humor and tolerance, with out the cruelty of his brothers. He could sit in his tent palace at Karakorum and do nothing except listen to th throngs who came to bow down at the throne of the Khan His brothers and officers carried on the wars, and Ye Li Chutsai saw to the gathering of the revenues.

Ogotai, broad of body and placid of mind, presents curious picture—a benevolent barbarian with the spoils o Cathay, the women of a dozen empires and the horse herd of unlimited pastures—all at his summons. His actions ar refreshingly unkinglike. When his officers protested at hi habit of giving away whatever he happened to see, he re plied that he would soon be gone out of the world and hi only abiding place would be the memory of men.

He did not approve of the treasures amassed by th Persian and Indian monarchs. "They were fools," he said "and it did them little good. They took nothing out of th world with them."

Shrewd Muhammadan merchants, hearing the rumor o his heedless generosity, did not fail to throng to his cou with varied goods and a huge bill of account. Such bill were presented to the Khan every evening when he sat i public. Once the nobles in attendance protested to hi that the merchants were overcharging him ridiculously Ogotai assented.

"They came expecting to profit from me, and I do no wish them to go away disappointed."

His goings-abroad were something in the nature of desert Haroun al Rashìd's. He liked to talk with chance met wanderers and on one occasion was struck by th poverty of an old man, who gave him three melons Having no silver or rich cloth about him at the time, th Khan ordered one of his wives to reward the beggar wit the pearls from her ear-rings which were of great size an value.

"It would be better, O my lord," she protested, "to sum mon him to court tomorrow and give him silver which h can put to more use than these pearls."

"The very poor," retorted the practical Mongol, "ca not wait until the morrow. Besides, the pearls will com back to my treasury before long."

Ogotai had all a Mongol's fondness for hunting, and watching wrestling matches and horse races. Minstrels and athletes journeyed to his court from far Cathay and the cities of Persia. In his day began the feuds that eventually divided the Mongol dynasties—the strife between Muhammadan and Buddhist, between Persian and Chinese. This bickering annoyed the son of Genghis Khan. And his simplicity of mind sometimes discomfited the intriguers. A certain Buddhist came to the Mongol with a story that Genghis Khan had appeared before him in a dream, and had voiced a command.

"Go thou and bid my son exterminate all believers in Muhammad, for they are an evil race."

The severity of the dead conqueror toward the peoples of Islam was well known, and a yarligh—a command of the great Khan delivered in a vision was an important matter. Ogotai meditated for a while.

"Did Genghis Khan address thee by the words of an interpreter?" he asked at length.

"Nay—O my Khan, he himself spoke."

"And thou knowest the Mongol speech?" persisted Ogotai.

It was an evident fact that the man honored by the vision spoke nothing but Turki.

"Then thou hast lied to me," retorted the Khan, "for Genghis Khan spoke only Mongol." And he ordered the antagonist of the Muhammadans to be put to death.

Another time, some Chinese showmen were entertaining Ogotai with a puppet play. Among the marionettes, the Khan noticed a figure of an old man, turbaned, with long white mustaches, which was dragged about at the tail of a horse. He demanded that the Chinese explain the meaning of this.

"It is thus," responded the masters of the show, "that Mongol warriors draw after them Moslem captives."

Ogotai ordered the show to be stopped and his attendants to bring from his treasury the richest cloths, rugs and precious work both of China and Persia. He showed the Chinese that their goods were inferior to the western articles, and he added, "In my dominion there is no single rich Muhammadan who does not own several Chines slaves—and no wealthy Chinese* has any Muhammada slaves. You are aware, besides, the Genghis Khan gav command that a reward of forty pieces of gold should b given to the slayer of a Muhammadan, while he did no think the life of a Chinese worth a donkey. How, then dare you mock the Muhammadans?" And he sent th showmen from the court with their marionettes.

XII

THE LAST COURT OF THE NOMADS

Being the Arrival of Fra Rubruquis at the Lashgar, o Traveling Court of Mangu Khan, the Grandson o Genghis Khan.[1]

ONLY TWO EUROPEANS have left us a description of th Mongols before the residence of the Khans was change to Cathay. One is the monk Carpini, and the other th burly Fra Rubruquis who rode with a stout heart int Tatary, half convinced that he would be tortured to death On behalf of his royal master, Saint Louis of France, h went not as an envoy of his king, but as an emissary o peace, in the hope that the pagan conquerors might b moved somewhat to refrain from warfare against Europ

For fellowship he had only a badly frightened brothe monk—Constantinople left behind them and the steppe of Asia closing around them. He had been chilled to th marrow and half starved, and jolted for three thousan

* "On the heels of the military conqueror came the administrative mandarin"— Leon Cahun. "L'esprit bureaucratique des Chinois qui dirigaient l'administrati Mongole."—Blochet.

The early Mongols never accustomed themselves to the use of money, and th had only contempt for the man who spent his life in hoarding it. Longfellow h put into verse the episode of the unfortunate kalif of Bagdad, who was overcor and captured in spite of a vast accumulation of treasure by Hulagu—Ogota celebrated nephew.

"I said to the Kalif, 'Thou art old;
Thou hast no need of so much gold,
Thou shouldst not have heaped and hidden it here Till the breath of battle was hot and near' "—

(For additional details on the lives of Ye Liu Chutsai and Ogotai, see t Nouveaux Mélanges Asiatiques of Abel-Rémusat, Tartarie by Louis Dubeux, T Book of the Yuan, translated from the Chinese annals by Father Amiot, and Siecle des Youen by M. Bazin.)

[1] As given in Astley's Voyages, but modified and condensed.

miles. The Mongols had outfitted him with sheepskins and felt footsocks and boots and hoods of skin, and had been careful to select a powerful horse for him each day during the long journey from the Volga frontier, because he was corpulent and heavy.

He was a mystery to the Mongols—a long-robed and barefoot man out of the far land of the Franks, who was neither merchant nor ambassador, who carried no arms, gave no presents and would accept no reward. A curious picture, this, of the weighty and dogmatic friar who had wandered out of stricken Europe to behold the Khan—a poverty-ridden, but not a humble member of the long train that journeyed east into the desert—Yaroslav, duke of Russia, Cathayan and Turkish lords, the sons of the king of Georgia, the envoy of the kalif of Bagdad, and the great sultans of the Saracens. And, with an observant eye, Rubruquis has described for us the court of the nomad conquerors, where the "barons" drank milk in jewel encrusted goblets and rode in sheepskins upon saddles ornamented with gold work.

In this fashion he describes his arrival at the court of Mangu Khan:

On Saint Stephen's day in December we came to a great plain where not a hillock was to be seen, and the next day we arrived at the court of the great Khan.

Our guide had a large house appointed for him, and only a small cottage was given to us three—hardly room enough for our baggage, beds and a small fire. Many came to our guide with drink made of rice in long-necked bottles, no different from the best wine except that it smelt otherwise. We were called out and questioned about our business. A secretary told me that we wanted the assistance of a Tartar army against the Saracens; and this astonished me as I knew the letters from your majesty [2] required no army and only advised the Khan to be a friend to all Christians.

The Mongols then demanded if we would make peace with them. To this I answered, "Having done no wrong, the King of the French hath given no cause for war. If warred against without cause, we trust in the help of God."

[2] Saint Louis, King of France, who was then a captive of the Mamluks.

At this they seemed all amazed, exclaiming, "Did you not come to make peace?"

The day following I went to the court barefoot, at which the people stared; but a Hungarian boy who was among them and knew our order,[3] told them the reason. Whereupon a Nestorian who was the chief secretary of the court asked many questions of us and we went back to our lodgings.

On the way, at the end of the court toward the east, I saw a small house with a little cross above it. At this I rejoiced, believing there might be some Christians within. I entered boldly, and found an altar well furnished, having a golden cloth adorned with images of Christ, the Virgin, Saint John the Baptist and two angels—the lines of their bodies and garments shaped with small pearls.

On the altar was a large silver cross, bright with precious stones and many embroiderings. Before it burned a lamp with eight lights. Sitting beside the altar I saw an Armenian monk somewhat black and lean, clad in a rough hairy coat and girded with iron under his haircloth.

Before saluting the monk, we fell flat on the ground singing Ave regina and other hymns, and the monk joined in our prayers. We then sat down by the monk who had a small fire in a pan before him. He told us that he—a hermit of Jerusalem—had come a month before us.

When we had talked for a while we went on to our lodgings, making a little broth of flesh and millet for our supper. Our Mongol guide and his companions were very drunk at court and little care was taken of us. So great was the cold that next morning the ends of my toes were frost bitten and I could no longer go barefoot.

From the time when the frost begins, it never ceases until May, and even then it freezes every night and morning. And, while we were there, the cold, rising with the wind, killed multitudes of animals. The people of the court [4] brought us ram-skin coats and breeches and shoes.

[3] Rubruquis was a Franciscan, and the first priest to appear in his robes in far Asia—Carpini, the envoy of the Pope, having put on secular dress.

[4] When Rubruquis speaks of the court, he means the quarters of Mangu Khan, his women and higher officers, in the center of the encampment. Of the encampment of Batu—Mangu's cousin—on the Volga, he says, "We were astonished at the magnificence of his encampment. The houses and tents stretched out to a vast length and there were great numbers of people ranged around for three or four leagues."

which my companion and the interpreter accepted. On the fifth of January we were taken into the court.

It was asked of us what reverence we would pay the Khan, and I said that we came from a far country and with their leave would first sing praises to God who had brought us hither in safety, and would afterwards do whatever might please the Khan. Then they went into the presence and related what we had told them. Returning, they brought us before the entrance of the hall, lifting up the felt which hung before the threshold, and we sang A solis ortus cardine.

They searched the breasts of our robes to see if we had any weapons concealed, and they made our interpreter leave his girdle and knife with one of the guards at the door. When we entered, our interpreter was made to stand at a table which was well furnished with mare's milk, and we were placed on a bench before the women.

The whole house was hung with cloth-of-gold, and on the hearth in the middle there was a fire of thorns, wormwood roots and cow-dung. The Khan sat upon a couch covered with bright and shining fur like seal's skin. He was a flat-nosed man of middle stature, about forty-five years of age, and one of his wives—a pretty little woman—sat beside him. Likewise one of his daughters, a hard-favored young woman, sat on a couch near him. This house had belonged to the mother of this daughter, who was a Christian, and the daughter was now mistress of it.

We were asked whether we would drink rice-wine, or mare's milk or mead made of honey—for they use these three kinds of liquors in winter. I answered that we had no pleasure in drink and would be content with what the Khan pleased to order. So we were served with rice-wine, of which I tasted a little out of respect.

After a long interval during which the Khan amused himself with falcons and other birds, we were commanded to speak and had to bow the knee. The Khan had his interpreter, a Nestorian, but our interpreter had been given so much liquor from the table that he was quite drunk. I addressed the Khan as follows:

"We give thanks and praise to God who hath brought us from such remote parts of the world to the presence of Mangu Khan on whom He hath bestowed such grea power. The Christians of the west, especially the King o the French, sent us unto him with letters, entreating hin to allow us to stay in his country, as it is our office to teac men the law of God. We therefore beg his highness t permit us to remain. We have neither silver nor gold no precious stones to offer, but we present ourselves to d service."

The Khan answered to this effect:

"Even as the sun sheds his beams everywhere, so ou power and that of Batu extends everywhere, so we hav no need of your gold or silver."

I entreated his highness not to be displeased at me fo mentioning gold and silver, as I spoke only to make clea our desire to do him service. Hitherto I had understoo our interpreter but he was now drunk and could not utte an intelligible sentence and it appeared to me that th Khan might be drunk likewise; wherefore I held my peace

Then he made us rise and sit down again, and after few words of compliment we withdrew from the presence One of the secretaries and interpreters went out with u and were very inquisitive about the kingdom of France particularly whether it had plenty of sheep, cattle, an horses, as if they meant to make it all their own. The appointed one to take care of us and we went to th Armenian monk, whither came the interpreter, saying tha Mangu Khan gave us two months to stay, until the extrem cold be past.

To this I answered, "God preserve Mangu Khan an grant him a long life. We have found this monk whon we think a holy man and we will willingly remain an pray with him for the well-being of the Khan."

(For on feast days the Christians come to court an pray for him and bless his cup after which the Saracen priests do the same and after them the idolatrous priests. The monk Sergius pretended that he only believed th Christians, but in this Sergius lied. The Khan believe none, but all follow his court as flies do honey. He give to all, and all think they are his familiars, and all prophes prosperity to him.)

We then went to our dwelling which we found ver

[5] Buddhists, with whom Rubruquis had no previous acquaintance.

cold as we had no fuel and were still fasting—though by then it was night. But he who had the care of us provided us some wood and a little food, and our guide of the journey hither, who was now to return to Batu, begged a carpet from us. This we gave him and he departed in peace.

The cold became severe and Mangu Khan sent us three fur coats with the hair outward, which we took gratefully. But we explained that we had no fit quarters to pray for the Khan—our cottage being so small we could scarcely stand up in it, neither could we open our books after lighting the fire, on account of the smoke. The Khan sent to ask the monk if he would be pleased with our company, who gladly received us and after this we had a better house.

While we were absent, Mangu Khan himself came into the chapel and a golden bed was fetched, upon which he sat with his queen opposite the altar. We were then sent for and a pavilion guard searched us for hidden weapons. On going in with a Bible and a breviary in my bosom, I first bowed down before the altar and then made obeisance to Mangu Khan, who caused our books to be brought to him and asked the meaning of the miniatures with which they were adorned. The Nestorians answered him as they thought proper, because we had not our interpreter. Being desired to sing a psalm after our manner, we chanted Veni, Sanctu Spiritus. Then the Khan left, but the lady remained and distributed gifts.

I honored the monk Sergius as my bishop. In many things he acted in a way that much displeased me, for he had made for himself a cap of peacock feathers, with a small gold cross. But I was well pleased with the cross. The monk by my suggestion craved leave to carry the cross aloft on a lance, and Mangu gave permission to carry it in any way we saw fit.

So we went about with Sergius, for the honor of the cross, as he had fashioned a banner on a cane as long as a lance, and we carried it throughout the tents of the Tatars, singing Vexilla regis prodeunt, to the great regret of the Mohammedans who were envious of our favor and of the Nestorian priests who were envious of the profit he had from its use.

Near Karakorum, Mangu has a large court, surrounded by a brick wall, like our priories. Within that court is a great palace where the Khan holds feasts twice in the yea in Easter and in summer, when he displays all his magnifi cence. Because it was indecent to have flagons going abou the hall of the palace as in a tavern, William Bouchier, th goldsmith from Paris, built a great silver tree just withou the middle entrance of the hall. At the roots of the tre were four silver lions from which flowed pure cow's milk On the four great boughs of the tree were twined golde serpents that discharge streams of wine of various sorts

The palace is like a church with three aisles and tw rows of pillars. The Khan sits on a high place at the nort wall, where he may be seen of all. The space between th Khan and the silver tree is left vacant for the coming an the going of the cup-bearers and the messengers wh bring gifts. On the right side of the Khan the men sit an on the left the women. Only one woman sits beside him not so high as he.

Except for the palace of the Khan, Karakorum is no so fine as the town of Saint Denis. It has two main streets that of the Saracens where the fairs are held, and the stree of the Cathayans which is filled with craftsmen. Besides there are many palaces in which are the courts of th secretaries of the Khan—also markets for millet and grain sheep and horses and oxen and wagons. There are twelv idol temples, two Mohammedan mosques and one Nes torian church.

About Passion Sunday the Khan departed for Kara korum, with his smaller houses [6] only, and the monk an we followed. On the journey we had to pass through hill country, where we encountered high winds, extreme col and much snow. About midnight the Khan sent to th monk and us, requesting us to pray to God to make th storm cease as the animals of his train were like to die being mostly with young. The monk sent him incense, de siring him to put it on the coals as an offering. Whethe he did this or no, I know not, but the wind and snow ceased, which had lasted two days.

On Palm Sunday we were near Karakorum and at daw of day we blessed the willow boughs on which there wer as yet no buds. About nine o'clock we entered the city carrying the cross aloft and passing through the street o the Saracens. We proceeded to the church where the Nestorians met us in procession. After mass, it being now evening, William Bouchier the goldsmith brought us to sup at his lodging. He had a wife born in Hungary, and we found here also Basilicus the son of an Englishman.

[6] Kibitkas, or wagon tents.

After supper we retired to our cottage which, like the oratory of the monk, was near the Nestorian church—a church of size very handsomely built, the ceiling covered with silk embroidered with gold.

We remained in the city to celebrate the festival of Easter. There was a vast multitude of Hungarians, Alans, Ruthenians or Russians and Georgians and Armenians who had not received the sacrament since they were taken prisoners. The Nestorians entreated me to celebrate the festival, and I had neither vestments nor altar.

But the goldsmith furnished me with vestments, and made an oratory on a chariot, decently painted with Scripture histories; he made also a silver box and an image of the blessed Virgin.

Until now I had hoped for the arrival of the king of Armenia, and a certain German priest who was likewise expected. Hearing nothing of the king and fearing the severity of another winter, I sent to ask the pleasure of the Khan, whether we were to remain or to leave him.

Next day some of the chief secretaries of the Khan came to me, one a Mongol who is cup-bearer to the Khan, and the rest Saracens. These men demanded on behalf of the Khan wherefore I had come to them? To this I answered that Batu had ordered me to the Khan, to whom I had nothing to say on behalf of any man, unless I were to repeat the words of God, if he would hear them.

Then they demanded what words I would speak, thinking I meant to prophesy prosperous things as others had done.

I therefore said: "To Mangu I would say that God hath given much, for the power and riches that he enjoys come not from the idols of the Buddhists."

Then they asked if I had been in Heaven, that I should know the commandments of God? And they went to Mangu saying that I had said he was an idolator and a Buddhist, who kept not the commandments of God. On the morrow the Khan sent again, explaining that he knew we had no message for him, but came to pray for him a other priests did, yet he wished to know if any of our am bassadors had ever been in his country. Then I declare unto them all I knew respecting David and Friar Andrew all of which was put down in writing and laid befor Mangu.

On Whitsunday I was called into the presence of th Khan. Before I went in, the goldsmith's son who was no my interpreter informed me that the Mongols had deter mined I was to return to my own country, and advise me to say nothing against it.

When I came before the Khan I kneeled, and he aske me whether I had said to his secretaries that he was Buddhist. To this I answered, "My lord, I said not so."

"I thought well you said not so," he answered, "for i was a word you ought not to have spoken." Then, reach ing forth the staff on which he leaned toward me, he said "Be not afraid."

To this I answered, smiling, that if I had feared I shoul not have come hither.

"We Mongols believe their is but one God," he sai then, "and we have an upright heart toward him."

"Then," I responded, "may God grant you this mind for without His gift it cannot be."

"God hath given to the hand divers fingers," he added "and hath given many ways to man. He hath given th Scriptures to you, yet you keep them not. Surely it i not in your Scriptures that one of you should disprais another."

"Nay," said I, "and I signified to your highness fro the beginning that I would not contend with any one."

"I speak not," said he, "of you. In like manner, it i not in your Scriptures that a man should turn from justic for the sake of profit."

To this I answered that I had not come to seek money having even refused what was offered me. And one of th secretaries then present avowed that I had refused a ba of silver and a piece of silk.

"I speak not of that," said the Khan. "God hath give to you the Scriptures and ye keep them not; but He hat given to us soothsayers, and we do what they bid us an live in peace."

He drank four times, I think, before uttering this, and, while I waited attentively in expectation that he might disclose more respecting his faith, he spoke again:

"You have stayed a long time here and it is my pleasure that you return. You have said that you dared not take my ambassador with you. Will you take, then, my messenger or my letters?"

To this I answered if the Khan would make me understand his words and put them in writing, I would willingly carry them to the best of my power.

He then asked if I would have gold or silver or costly garments, and I answered that we were accustomed to accept no such things, yet could not get out of his country without his help. He explained that he would provide for us, and demanded how far we wished to be taken. I said it were sufficient if he had us conveyed to Armenia.

"I will cause you to be carried thither," he made answer, "after which, look to yourself. There are two eyes in a single head, yet they both behold one object. You came from Batu, and therefore you must return to him."

Then, after a pause, as if musing, he said, "You have a long way to go. Make yourself strong with food, that you may be able to endure the journey."

So he ordered them to give me drink, and I departed from his presence and returned not again.

Bibliography

I

SOURCES

THE earliest source was the Mongolian Altyn debter, the Golden Book, now lost. Upon this was based the Chinese Yuan shi or Mongol Annals, and the history of Rashid ed-Din. (See below.)

Another Mongolian work called the Secret History is preserved only in the Chinese translation, the Yuan ch'ao mi shi, originally written (1228) in Mongol, in Ugur letters by a contemporary of the great Khan.

In the mid-seventeenth century the best known of the Mongol annalists, Ssanang Setzen, compiled his Chung taishi Khadun Toghudji), a legendary account of the ancestors and life of Genghis Khan. It is distorted with Buddhist myths, but gives us the only intimate picture of early Mongols. Translated into Russian by the Archimandrite Hyacinth, and thence —at least in part—into German by Isaac Jacob Schmidt in 1829. (See below.)

Of the Chinese sources, the most important are:

The T'oung kien kang mou, or history of the imperial dynasties, compiled by Ssi ma Kouang. This has very little to say about the early Mongol rulers. Available in a French translation, of doubtful value to-day, the Histoire générale de la Chine traduit du tong-Kien-Kang-Mou par le Père Joseph Anne-Marie de Moyriac de Mailla dirigée par M. le Roux des Hautesrayes, Paris, 1777-1778.

The Ch'in chêng lu, by an anonymous writer, gives a narrative of the Mongols beginning with Yesukai and ending with the death of Ogotai.

From this, and the Yuan ch'ao mi shi, the most important of the Chinese sources, the Yuan Shi, or Mongol Annals, was compiled in 1370. It is more accurate than the work of Ssanang Setzen, but—as in the case of the Mongol sagas—of doubtful value when it deals with the western countries. It has been translated into French under the title of the Histoire de Gentchiscan et de toute la dinastie des Mongous, tirée de l'Histoire Chinoise by Anthony Gaubil, Paris, 1739.

By all odds the most valuable source is the Jamiut-Tarikh, or Collection of Annals, by Fadl'allah Rashid ed-Din.

a Persian who was administrator of Persia under Ghaza Khan in the late thirteenth century. "There remain," sai Rashid in his introduction, "in the archives of the Mong Khan of Persia some historical fragments of acknowledge authority written in the Mongol language and characters" . . In his task of translating and clarifying these documents Ra hid—a most gifted historian—was aided by a staff of hi torians, Chinese, Ugurs and Turks, and by the Mongo themselves. Unfortunately, the Jami-ut-Tavaríkh is still u translated, but has been published by Brosset in the Gibl Memorial Series, Leyden and London.

The Taríkh-i-Jahan Gushai, or History of the World Co queror, by Ala ed-Din Ata Malik, called Juvaini, written 1257 or 1260 (Gibbs Memorial Series, London, 1912-14), almost of equal value, but disappointing to the biographer Genghis Khan in that it gives at first hand only an account the last ten years of the reign of the conqueror.

Another contemporary source is the K'amil-ut-Tavaríkh of Ibn Athir, called Nissavi, 1231. This is rather the histo of Jelal ed-Din and the Persian wars.

The later works of Khwándamír, the Habiba Síyar, 152 and the Raudata Safa, 1470, of his grandfather, Mírkhwán contain only fragmentary notices of Genghis Khan. So als does the Fateh Nameh Tavaríkh al Osman, or Osman Histo of Abulcaïr, 1550.

II

HISTORIES OF GENGHIS KHAN AND THE EARLY MONGOLS FROM THE SOURCES[1]

ABULGHAZI, BAHADUR KHAN. Histoire généalogique des Ta tars, Leyden, 1726. (The author, an Uzbek khan, wro in the seventeenth century, drawing most of his info mation from Rashid. Interesting, but of little value the student until the author deals with his own period

DOUGLAS, ROBERT KENNAWAY. The Life of Jenghiz Kha translated from the Chinese, London, 1877. (Sum marized in the Encyclopedia Britannica.)

ERDMANN, FRANZ VON. Vollstaendige Uebersicht der aelte ten tuerkischen, tatarischen und mogholischen Voelke staemme nach Raschid-ud-Din's Vorgänge, Kaza 1841. Temudschin der Unerschütterliche, Leipzig, 186

[1]Most of the sources for the life of Genghis Khan exist only in manuscr form, untranslated. The volumes in Group II are rare for the most part. Bo that may be found in the largest public libraries and university libraries marked with an asterisk.

KRAUSE, F. E. A. Cingis Hon. Die Geschichte seines lebens nach der Chinesischen Reichsannalen, Heidelberg, 1922. (A short account of the Khan from the Chinese annals.) Geschichte Ostasiens, Göttingen, 1925. (An excellent summary of the Mongol conquests.)

PETIS DE LA CROIX. Histoire du Grand Genghizcan Premier Empereur des Anciens Mogols traduite de plusieurs Auteurs Orientaux & de Voyageurs Européens, Paris, 1710. (The author devoted ten years to a translation of the Persian and Arabic sources. He did not consult the Chinese annals and the chief interest of his work to-day is in its details and anecdotes of the Persian campaigns.)

SCHMIDT, ISAAC JACOB. Geschichte der Ost-Mongolen, etc., verfasst von Ssanang Setzen Chungtaidshi, St. Petersburg, 1829. (A valuable translation from the Mongol saga, unfortunately excessively rare.)

VLADIMIRTZOV, B. J. Jenghis Khan, Berlin and Moscow, 1922. (A work of 176 pp, in Russian that refers frequently to the "Yuen-cao-mi-si.")

III

GENERAL HISTORIES OF THE MONGOLS

BARTHOLD, WILHELM. Turkestan im Zeitalter des Mongoleneinfalls, St. Petersburg, 1900. (Devoted in large part to Genghis Khan, and containing matter from the sources not hitherto published elsewhere.) Die Entstehung des Reiches Tchinghiz-chans, St. Petersburg, 1896.

CAHUN, LEON. Introduction a l'histoire de l'Asie: Turcs et Mongols, des origines à 1405, Paris, 1896. (A curiously valuable book. The author, a brilliant linguist, drew material from many sources, but became fascinated by Turkish legends and Mongol military achievement.)

CORDIER, HENRI. Histoire Générale de la Chine et de ses relations avec les pays étrangers, Paris, 1920. (Notable for its account of the contact of China with the west. The sketch of Genghis Khan in Vol. II is drawn chiefly from de Mailla and d'Ohsson.)

CURTIN, JEREMIAH. The Mongols, Boston, 1908. (A popular translation of the Mongol sagas, it is uncertain from what source.)

DE GUIGNES, J. Histoire Générale des Huns des Turcs des Mogols, Paris, 1756. (A gigantic work, from Chinese and other sources. It has little value to-day.)

HOWORTH, SIR HENRY H. History of the Mongols, London 1876-88. (A monumental work, valuable to the student based mainly upon Erdmann and d'Ohsson.)

MOURADGA D'OHSSON. Histoire des Mongols depuis Tchinguiz-Khan jusqu'a Timour Bey, The Hague and Amsterdam, 1834-5. (A full and complete history of the Mongols, from the Persian and Arab writers—though Gaubil has also been consulted. As in the case of M Cordier, Baron d'Ohsson is antagonistic to Genghis Khan, and reveals him only as a military commander of the Mongols.)

IV

ACCOUNTS OF THE EARLY VOYAGERS

BERGERON, PIERRE. Relation des voyages en Tartarie de Fr Gvillavme de Rvbrvqvis, Fr. Iean dv Plan Carpin Plvs vn traicté des Tartares, Paris, 1634. (The treatise on the "Tartars" is remarkable for its day.)

* CARPINI, JOHN OF PLANO. Hakluyt Society, London, 1900 II Series, Vol. IV. (The first European to visit the Mongols, less than a generation after the death of Genghis Khan.)

IBN BATUTA. Translated by Defrémery and Sanguinetti Paris, 1853. (The travels of the celebrated Arab who passed through most of Asia at the end of the Mongol dominion.)

* MARCO POLO. The Book of Marco Polo, translated by Sir Henry Yule and edited by Henri Cordier, London 1921.

* RUBRUQUIS (WILLIAM OF RUBRUK.) The Journey of William of Rubruk to the eastern parts of the World Hakluyt Society, London, 1900, II Series, Vol. IV.

V

MISCELLANEOUS

BAZIN, M. Le Siècle des Youên, ou tableau historique de l littérature Chinoise depuis l'avénement des empereurs mongols, Paris, 1850.

* BRETSCHNEIDER, E. Medieval Researchers from Eastern Asiatic Sources, London, 1888. (Bits of the geograph of Ye Liu Chutsai and a summary of the western campaigns of Genghis Khan.)

* BROWNE, E. G. Literary History of Persia, London, 1906. (Contains a good modern dissertation on the Mongols.)

* Cambridge Medieval History, Vol. IV, the Eastern Roman Empire, New York, 1923. (A summary of the Mongol conquests, with a new appreciation of their importance.)

CORDIER, HENRI. Mélanges d'Histoire et de Géographie Orientales, Tome II, Paris, 1920. (The Mongol invasion of Europe.)

DUBEUX, LOUIS. Tartarie, Paris, 1840.

DULAURIER, EDOUARD. Les Mongols d'après les historiens arméniens, Journal Asiatique, 5th ser., 1858, pp. 192-255. Also 1860, pp. 295-306.

FEER, LEON. La Puissance et la Civilisation Mongoles au treizième siècle, Paris, 1867.

Joinville. (Edited by Francisque-Michel) Paris, 1867. (One of the best of the medieval chronicles.)

JORDAIN, CATALANI. P. Mirabilia Descripta sequitur de Magno Tartaro. (A medieval viewpoint. To this might be added the Relations taken out of Roger Wendover and Matthew Paris, in Purchas.)

JULG, BERNHARD. On the Present State of Mongolian Researches, J.R.A.S., January, 1882.

* LANE-POOLE, STANLEY. The Mohammedan Dynasties, Westminster, 1894.

MOSHEIM, J. L. Historia Tartarorum ecclesiastica, Helmstadt, 1741.

* PARKER, E. H. A Thousand Years of the Tatars, New York, 1924. (An excellent account of the Tatar peoples up to the birth of Genghis Khan.)

PETIS DE LA CROIX, FRANCOIS (the son of de la Croix, the author of the life of Genghis Khan). Abrégé Chronologique de l'Histoire Ottamane, Paris, 1768. (Summaries of the rulers of the Mongol peoples from Genghis Khan to the seventeenth century.)

QUATREMERE, M. Histoire des Mongols de la Perse par Raschid-eldin, traduite, accompagnée de notes, Paris, 1836. (The life of Rashid, and the splendid notes on Mongol customs would make this valuable, even if it were not the only translation of Rashid, though merely a portion of the Jami-ut-Tavarikh.)

REMUSAT, JEAN PIERRE ABEL. Nouveaux Mélanges Asiatiques, Paris, 1829. (Sketches of Subotai, Ye Liu Chutsai and others.) Observations sur l'Histoire des Mongols orientaux, de Ssanang Setzen, Paris, 1832.

* STUBE, RUDOLF. Tschingizchan: seine Staatsbildung und seine Persönlichkeit. In, Neue Jahrbücher für das klassische Altertum, Vol. XXI, 1908, pp. 532-541. (A brief commentary on the conqueror.)

TIMKOWSKI, IGOR FEDOROVICH. Travels of the Russian Mission Through Mongolia to China. With Corrections and Notes by Klaproth, London, 1827. (Translated apparently from the French. Valuable geographic and historical research by a member of one of the Russian embassies.)

VISDELOU, CLAUDE. Supplement to D'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale, Paris, 1780.

* YULE, SIR HENRY. Cathay and the Way Thither, Hakluyt Society, London, 1866.

Index

Index

A

Abd el Rahman, 207
Abel-Rémusat, 210, note
Accouterments, 31, 111
Adriatic Sea, 180, 199
Afghanistan, 131, 141
Africa, 105
Ala-eddin Muhammad, Shah (see Muhammed Shah)
Alans, 134, 217
Alexander III, Pope, 192
Alexander the Great, 1, 3, 100, 152, 165, 188
Almalyk, 141, 193
Almalyk, Khan of, 93
Amiot, Father, 210, note
Amir, 149
Amu River, 121, 126, 132, 137, 141, 148
Andrew, Friar, 218
Answer to the Dhimmis, An, Richard Gottheil, 203, note
Antioch, 181
Aral Sea, 94, 106, 121, 131, 137, 142, 182
Arghun, Il-khan, 34, 203
Armenia, 3, 180
Armenia, King of, 217
Armenians, 154, 188, 203, 205
  writings of, 3
Asia Minor, 181, 203
Astley's Voyages, 210, note
Astrologers, 55, 112
Atabeg, 106, 149
Attila, 3
Aubon, Ponce d', 198, 200
Austria, 196, 204
Avars, 99

B

Babar (grandson of Genghis Khan), 92, 181 opinion of Genghis Khan, 191
Bacon, Roger, 2
Badakshan, 151
Bagdad, 106, 132, 181, 183
Bagdad, Kaliph of, 103, 105, 211
Baibars (grandson of Genghis Khan), 197
Baichu, 202
  Papal envoys to, 203 variations of name, 205, note
Baikul, Lake, 9, 17, 50, 110, 182
Balkash, Lake, 113
Balkh, 107, 125, 131, 142
Bamboo Books, 66
Bamiyan, 159
Barmecides, The, 105
Basilicus, 217
Batu (grandson of Genghis Khan), 92, 175
  army of, 194
  capital of, 204 defeated by Tamerlane, 181 encampment of, 212, note
  Europe, in, 180, 197
  Golden Horde of, 196; 204, note
Bayan, 34
Bazin, M., 210, note
Beauvais, Vincent de, 204, note
Bela IV, King, 2, 196, 198, 199
Bela Noyon, 164 cities ravaged by, 165
Belgutai (half-brother of Genghis Khan), 20, 21
Bengal, 181
Bibliography, 221
Birds, River of, 144
Bishbalik, 54
Black Cathay (see Cathay, Black)
Black Sands, The (see Karakorum)
Black Sea, 196
Blanche of Castile, Queen, 2
Blochet, 210, note
Bogdo, 4, 56, 152
Bohemia, King of, 196, 199
Bohemians, 198
Bohemond of Antioch, 205, note
Bokhara, 107, 121, 125, 140, 183, 196
  sacking of, 127 walls of, 126

Boleslas of Poland, 2, 196, 197, 199
Book of the Yuan, The, Father Amiot, 210, note
Borchu, 22, 33, 36
Bouchier, William, 216, 217
Boulger, Demetrius, 195
Bourchikoun Stock, 14, 18, 45, 60
Bourtai Fidjen (wife of Genghis Khan), 15, 20, 25, 171, 173
  burial-place of, 182
  capture of, 26
  marriage to Genghis Khan, 25 saves her husband, 29 sons of, 92
Brandenburg, 196
British in India, 182
Buddhism, 93
Buddhists, 152, 188, 209; 214, note; 217
  Mongols become, 181
Bulgars, 135
Buran, 113

C

Cæsar, Julius, 188
Cæsars, The, 1
Cahun Leon, 193; notes on pages 197, 199, 200, 210
Cambridge Medieval History, The, 181, note; 187, 205
Caravan Routes, 122, 132, 153
Carpathian Mts., 196, 199
Carpini, Fra, 2, 59, 61, 210; note description of Mongols, 201
Carts, Battle of the, 31
Caspian Sea, 132, 137, 165, 172, 181, 182, 193, 202, 204
Cathay, 180
  Christians in, 192 civilization of, 66, 86 downfall of, 85 dynasties of, 42, note; 63, 74 emperor, new, 72 emperor, weak policy of, 80 Kubilai Khan in, 181 loyalty to throne, 81 meaning of name, 42, note Mongol attacks on, 75, 77, 78
  savants of, 125
  tribute paid to, 70
  wall of, 71 war engines of, 69, 119 weakness of, 69
  Ye Liu Chutsai, 206
Cathay, Black, 56, 71, 92
Catherine the Great, Empress, 182
Caucasus Mts., 134
Chamuka, 46, 53
Charmagan, 180
Chartres, 200
Chatagai (son of Genghis Khan), 140
  army of, 179
  council, at, 167
  duties of, 92
  feud with Ogotai, 180 loyalty of, 178
  monarch, a, 175
  power inherited by, 173
Chepé Noyon, 61, 76, 82, 141 against Cathay, 75, 77
  Cathay, fighting for, 71
  death of, 135
  Gutchluk, defeat of, 93
  Muhammadans, battle with, 116
  northward march, 134
  Persia, march into, 112 pursuit of Muhammad Shah, 131
  ruse of, 78 service in the Gobi, on, 82 strategy of, 122, 125
  tutor to Juchi, 42 valor of, 35
  wanderings of, 100
Chih-li, 76
Chin Empire, 76, 79, 180; notes on pages 42, 73, 106
China (see Cathay)
China Sea, 94, 193
Chinese, writings of, 4 (see also Cathay)
Chin shan, 113
Christians, Mongols and, 202 (see also Nestorian Christians)
Chroniclers of Genghis Khan, 3, 135, 139, 167, 171, 173, 174, 175, 183, 188, 192, 201, 204
Circassians, 134
Cities, Destruction of, 128, 147, 148, 150, 160
Columbus, Christopher, 184
Confucius, 66, note
Constantinople, 181, 184, 210
Cordier, Henri, 200, note
Cracov, 197

Crimea, The, 135, 182
Croats, 198
Crusaders, Fiefs of, 205, note
Crusades, End of, 183

D

Damascus, 181
Damascus, Kalif of, 105
Danube River, 199
Daroga, 135, 153
Delhi, 160
Deligoun-Bouldak, Mt., 60
De Quincey, Thomas, 182
Dnieper River, 135, 193, 195
Dubeux, Louis, 210, note

E

Easter Celebration, 216
Edessa, 205
Education, Mongol, 180
Edward I, King, 204
Egypt, 105
Elbe River, 199
Europe, correspondence with Mongols, 202 opinion of Mongols, 200
  Subotai vs. Middle, 196

F

Fakirs, 154
Feasts, Mongol, 25
Flight of a Tatar Tribe, De Quincey, 182
France, 203, 211
Frederick II, Emperor, 2; 39, note; 202

G

Gama, Vasco da, 186
Genghis Khan, administration, tolerant, 155 alliance with Prester John, 41 allies of, 72, 93 ambition of, 40 ancestry of, 14
  appearance, personal, 14 attacks on Cathay, 74, 77, 78 Bagdad, envoy from, 103
  Bamiyan stormed by, 159 battlefront of, 121 battle with Prester John, 47 birth name of, 9
  birthplace of, 9
  Bokhara taken, 126
  Bourtai captured, 29 boyhood of, 13 burial of, 174
  burialplace of, 175
  capture of, 18
  Carts, Battle of the, 30
  character of youthful, 23 chief of all khans, chosen, 50, 56
  Chinese title of, 42
  chroniclers of, 3, 135, 139, 168, 169, 171, 173, 174, 183, 187, 194, 200, 202 code of laws of, 55, 190 commanders of, 61 communication, army, 153 conquests of, 55
  costume of, 111 council of, 166, 167
  court of, 90
  culture and, 183
  death of, 173
  demands of, 33 descendants of, 182
  desert march of, 125 effects of conquests, 183 empire, extent of, 3, 94, 95, 165 empire intact after death of, 180 enemies of, 17
  envoys slain, 104 escape from Targoutai, 18 father's death, 15 first-born, mourning for his, 172 gifts from Cathayans, 80 governing Cathay, 86 governing in absence, 109 grandson slain, 160
  Hia, destruction of, 172 home, return, 165
  horde, strength of, 193 horse-posts established, 150, 151 horses stolen from, 21 hunting, goes, 137
  Indus, battle on the, 161 inherits khanship, 15 instructions of, last, 173 Islam campaign, length of, 166 judgment of, 37
  Karakorum, capital of, 89 Kha Khan, 57
  letter-writing, 152 loyalty of followers, 30

maneuvers of, 78
Marco Polo on, 54 marriage of, 26 message of Emperor of Cathay, 73 mourning, period of, 175 mystery of, the, 1 names of, 1, 103 night attack by Karaïts, 47 noncombatants with, 112
notes on, 187
nucleus of kingdom, 54 obedience of sons to, 178 opinion of himself, 152, 166 orientation of pavilion, 171 paladins of, 35, 55 personality of, 3 personal valor of, 160 policy of, 148, 188 policy toward Cathay, 69 power of, 91
prayer of, 34
Prester John aids, 30 prestige of, 94 religion, treatment of, 58, 90 reproach to Prester John, 50 seal, first royal, 55 soldiers lent to Cathay, 71 sons of, legitimate, 92, 93 statecraft of, 46 strength of, 40
Tatars crushed by, 42 temper of, terrible, 156
Temujin, 10
Torrents the, and, 35 trade, interest in, 100, 153 transport problems, 109 tribute asked from, 71 tribute demanded by, 156 war with Muhammad Shah, 104 wives of, 71, 80, 92 wounded, 78
Ye Liu Chutsai and, 206
George of Russia, Grand-Duke, 2
Georgia, 134
Georgians, 188, 217
Germans, 197, 198, 199
Ghazan Khan, 181
Ghazna, 160
Ghazna, Mahmoud of, 105
Gobi Desert, 2, 5, 71, 165 life in the, 9
Gog, 2
Golden Horde, The, 183, 196
Gottheil, Richard, 203, note
Gran, 199
Granada, 105
Great Wall of China, 70
Gul'ldar, 47
Gupta Hill, 48
Gur-khan, 45
Gurtai, 138
Gutchluk, 35, 56, 99, 133
death of, 93
empire of, 93

H

Haithon, 205, 206
Hamadan, 133
Hannibal, 69, 76, 78
Haroun al Rashīd, 105, 208
Henry III of England, King, 2
Henry of Silesia, Duke, 2
Henry the Pious, 196, 197
Herat, 107, 149
Hia, 71, 78, 165 destruction of, 171
Himalaya Mts., 206
Hindu Kush Mts., 149, 159
Hindustan, 182
History of the Mongols, Howorth, 203, note
Hiung-nu Monarchs, 61, 196
Hoang Ho River, 180
Holy Land, 183
Mongols in, 205
Holy Sepulcher, 183
Ho-pao, 111
Horses, 21, 34, 159; 179, note
Hospitalers, 197
Houlun (mother of Genghis Khan), 13, 15, 18, 19, 29, 37
Howorth, Sir Henry, 193; notes on pages, 200, 203
Hulagu (grandson of Genghis Khan), 205 conquests of, 180
descendants of, 181
dominion of, 205
Syrian command of, 203
Hungarians, 196, 217
Hungary, 196, 197, 200, 205
Huns, 100

I

Idikut of the Swooping Hawks, 72
Idikut of the Ugurs, 143, 168, 193

Ikhüdür, 25
Il-khans, 181, 183, 203
Iman, 126
Inaljuk, Governor of Otrar, 103, 125
India, 106, 165, 182
Indus River, 100 battle on the, 161
Innocent IV, Pope, 39, note; 204, 205
Invasion, Plan of, 194
Iron Gate of Alexander, 134
Islam, arming of, 143 destruction of power of, 184 faith of, 104
  first view of, 115 military power of, 105
  savants of, 125
Ivan the Terrible (Grodznoi), 180

J

Jamshid, 105
Japan, 181
Jaxartes River (see Syr River)
Jelal ed-Din, Sultan, 117, 119, 149 army, raising, 131 end of power, 180 escape of, 137, 144, 164 Mongols defeated by, 159 pursuit of, 103 victory, action in, 160, 164
Jend, 125
Jerome, St., 2
Jerusalem, 105, 181, 203, 206
Jews, 153
Jihad, 149
John of Plano Carpini (see Carpini, Fra)
Joinville, 202
Juchi (eldest son of Genghis Khan), 42, 78, 138, 139, 188, 196, 205
  army of, 194
  attack on Muhammad Shah, 116
  death of, 172
  disobedience of, 156
  duties of, 93
  Muhammadans, battle with, 115
  Persia, march into, 112, 113
  reconciliation with father, 168 sent away from army, 143 tactics of, 117 wandering of, 100

K

Ka'aba, The, 104
Kabul, Khan, 14, 17
Kâf Mountain, 99
Kaidu (grandson of Genghis Khan), 197, 200
Kalifs, Bagdad, of, 103 power broken, 181
Kalmuks, 182
Kambalu, 155 and note; 184
Kang, 19
Kankali Turks, 129
Karaits, 14, 20, 29, 41, 60, 92, 182, 188 defeat by Genghis Khan, 50
  Mongol spoil taken by, 45
Kara Khitai, 93; 106, note
Karakorum, 46, 69, 87, 93, 151, 173, 175, 192, 199, 202, 204, 208 campaign, return from, 171 Court City, the, 179 fate of, 91, 183
  headquarters of Genghis Khan, 89
  Mangu's court at, 215
Kara Tau, 113
Kashmir, 167
Kassar (brother of Genghis Khan), 13, 18, 19, 21, 33, 36, 37, 188
Kasvin, 133
Kerulon River, 17, 23
Kha Khan, 57, 152, 153, 175, 181, 194
  choosing the, 178
Kharesm, 106; 106, note; 137, 166, 188
Kharesm, Shah of, 100, 103
Khingan Mts., 78
Khojend, 118
Khorassan, 107, 125, 143, 152, 159, 167
Khoten, 54
Kibitka, 31, 167; 216, note
K'ien lung, Emperor, 182
Kiev, 134, 188, 196
Kipchaks, 100, 134, 194
Kirghiz, 71
Kirghiz Chiefs, 168
Kiyat, 35
Koh-i-Baba, Mts., 159
Ko pao yu, 111

Koran, The, 104
desecration of, 126
Korea, 3, 82, 181
Koreans, 194
Kubilai Khan (grandson of Genghis Khan), 4, 82, 92; 155, note; 180
army of, 194
council, at, 168
court of, 181
death of, results of, 181
Japan, against, 181
Kubla Khan (see Kubilai Khan)
Kumiss, 9
Kunduz, 125
Kurds, 134
Kurultai, 36, 56, 194
description of, 167
Kuyuk, 180

L

Lahore, 165
Lamas, 154
Lane-Poole, Stanley, 192
Lashgar, 211
Laws, Code of, 57, 188
Lemberg, 196
Liao Princes, 75, 77, 80
Liao-tung, 75, 78, 79, 80, 82, 83, 188
Liao-yang, 77
Liegnitz, 2, 197, 198
Lion King, The, 167
Lion Lord of the Western Turks, 75
Liquors, Mongol, 214
Literary History of Persia, A, Edward G. Browne, 106, note
Lomnitz, 199
Longfellow, Henry W., 210, note
Louis IX, King, 2, 198, 203, 211; 212, note correspondence of, 203
Lyons, Council of, 2, 203

M

Malik, Emir, 161
Magog, 2
Magyars (see Hungarians)
Mahmoud, 105
Malay States, 181
Mamluks, 106, 183, 195, 206, 211
Manchus, 194
Mangu (grandson of Genghis Khan), 200, 205 appearance, personal, 213
army of, 193
court of, 211
hospitality of, 214
Mangudai, 116, note
Manhut Clan, 47
Maps, 43, 123
Massacres, Mongol, 188
Masséna, Marshal, 75
Massif, 166
Mecca, 104
Memoirs of Babar, Emperor of Hindustan, Erskine and Leyden, 191
Merik, 144
Merkits, 29, 41, 60, 82
Merv, 132
storming of, 144
Mesopotamia, 181, 205
Mingan, Prince, 85
Moghuls, 181, note
Mohi, Battle of, 199, 200
Moldavia, 198
Mongols, 35
accouterments, 111
ancestry of, 14, note
army, value of, 180
besieging Timur Malik, 118 Bokhara, in, 127 camping, 112
captives, treatment of, 54, 80 125, 147, 148, 166 character, 58, 60, 188 conquests after Ogotai's death 180 correspondence with Europe, 203 council of khans, 50 councils of, 62 education of, 180 empire dissolved, 181, 182
Europe, in, 2, 196
European opinion of, 200 feuds of, 29 fighting methods, 31 foraging, 115
golden age of, 181
Golden Horde, The, 181
heat on, effect of, 165 horse-post camps, 152
hospitality of, 90

hunt, a clan, 42, 62
hunt, an army, 138
illiteracy of, 3
Jelal ed-Din, defeat by, 159
laws, code of, 57, 188
liquors of, 213 loyalty, importance of, 34 massacres by, 147, 148
merrymaking of, 25
Moghuls, 182
Muhammadan wars with, 42
notes on, 184
Persia, march into, 112
plan of invasion, 194 preparations for war, 72 pursuit of Wai Wang, 82 racial stock of, 14, note retreats, reason for, 77 Russians and, 134
silver age of, 183
strength of, 30, 75, 112, 193
struggle to live, 17
Taidjuts, 18
territory marched over, 110 trading of, 103 tradition of, 23 union of, 62 war engines, 119, 200 weaknesses of, 57 weapons, 62 women, duties of, 26, 110
Moravia, 197, 198
Moscow, 136
Mou-baligh, 160, 178
Mourning, Period of, 177
Muezzin, 148
Muhammad the Prophet, 188 Muhammadans, 1 artisans, 154 hatred of Genghis Khan, 188
Mongols and, 4, 42, 93, 161, 203
Mongols become, 181
title of Genghis Khan, 152 trade goods of, 100 Muhammad Shah, 103, 106, 107
character of, 107
death of, 134
flight of, 125
losses in battle, 117
strategy of, 122, 140
strength of, 108, 115
throne of, 168 war with Genghis Khan, 164 Muhuli, 34, 61, 141
against Cathay, 75
commanding at Yen-king, 85
death of, 165
governing Cathay, 94, 107
Sung, conquest of the, 89
Mullahs, 94
Multan, 165
Munlik, 37, 38
Murgh Ab, 144
Myths of the Middle Ages, Baring-Gould, 192

N

Naimans, 41, 54, 93
Nan-lu, 71
Napoleon, 1, 3, 76, 152, 188
Nesa, 143
Nestorian Christians, 29, 55, 58, 90, 135, 191, 212, 217
Ney, Marshal, 77
Nieustadt, 205
Nisapur, 132, 141
Nouveaux Mélanges Asiatiques, Abel-Rémusat, 210, note
Noyon, 90

O

Oder River, 199
Ogotai (son of Genghis Khan), 168, 175, 205 administrator of, 206
army of, 179, 194
cause of death of, 206
character of, 207
council of, 180
death of, 180, 199
duties of, 93
feud with Chatagai, 180 Genghis Khan's successor, 178 life of, 210, note
power inherited by, 173
rule of, 179 son, death of, 160, 172 treasure of, 208
tribute paid to, 179
Olmutz, 200
Omar al Khayyam, 105
Onon River, 17, 23
Ordu, 15, 34
Ordu-baligh, 179

Orkhons, 61, 70, 72, 73, 82, 90, 111, 174, 178 ride of the, 131
Orluk, 92
Othmans, 184
Otrar, 103, 122
Oxus River (see Amu River)

P

Paladins, Bela's 199 costumes of, 167 court of the, 167
  Genghis Khan's, 35, 56
Palestine, 203
Paris, 200
Paris, Matthew, 193
Parthians, 62
Peking, 65
Pe lu, 112, 116
Persia, 125, 140, 180, 181, 205 kings of, 100
Persia, Sir Percy Sykes, 196
Persian Gulf, 106
Persians, 62
  writings of, 3
Peshawar, 166
Pesth, 194
Pétis de la Croix, 192
Physicians, 55, 112, 150, 156
Pilgrims, 153
Poland, 171, 183, 196, 197
Polo, Marco, 54 , 58, 137, 155, 181, 184, 193
Pony Express, The, 150, 153
Post Roads, description of, 153 stations, 153, 154 156 tribute paid on, 156 Prester John, 14, 20, 29, 133 alliance with Genghis Khan, 20 battle with Genghis Khan, 47 Chinese title of, 42
  death of, 54
  enemy to Genghis Khan, 45
  flight of, 182
  notes on, 191
Pripet Marshes, 197

R

"Raging Torrents, The," 35
Ragusa, 200
Religions, Treatment of, 90, 93, 209 Roads, importance of, 184 making of, 152
Roof of the World, The, 91, 92, 166
Rubruquis, Fra, 58, 91, 184, 203 description of Mongols, 210
Russia, 134, 181, 183, 194, 197
Russians, 217
Ruthenia, 196
Ruthenians, 217

S

Saint-Denis, 216
Samarkand, 93, 109, 112, 121, 125, 140 administration, Mongol, 166 surrender of, 129
Saracens, 217
Saxony, 196
Sayo River, 199
Sayyid, 106, 126
Scriptures, The, 217, 219
Seal, Royal, 55
Seljuks, 106, 203, 205
Sergius (monk), 215
Shaibani, 181
Shaman, 37, 38
Shan-si, 76, 78
Shiraz, 168
Short History of China, A, Demetrius Boulger, 196 Sicily, 105
Siècle des Youên, Le, M. Bazin, 210, note Silesia, 197
Silesia, Duke of, 197
Smyrna, 181
Soo, 34
Soothsayers, 58, 209
Spalato, Thomas de, 199 and 201, notes
Speculum Historiale, Vincent de Beauvais, 204, note
Ssanang Setzen, 3, 4; 39 note
Stories of the Nations (Turkey), 192
Strakosch-Grassman, 200, note
Subotai Bahadur, 35, 61, 82, 141, 143, 150, 171, 179
  against Cathay, 75
  army of, 194
  conquest of Europe, 180, 196

death of, 205
endurance of, 200
Europe, return from, 159, 167, 168
Korea, in, 82
Merkits, against the, 93 northward march, 133 observations of, 135 pursuit of Muhammad Shah, 131 service of, 35 value of, 179
Sung, The, 82, 89 conquest of, 172 sparing of, 179
Sungarian Pass, 113
Susdal, 183
Sykes, Sir Percy, 193
Syr River, 115, 116, 118, 121, 167
Syria, 203, 204

T

Tabula rasa, 148
Taghdumbash, 99, 100
Taidjuts, 19, 29
attack on Genghis Khan, 30
(see also Mongols)
Taitong-fu, 76, 77
Tamerlane, 2, 93, 191
Mongols conquered by, 181
T'ang, 66
Targoutai, 18
Tar-khan, 55, 90
Tartarie, Louis Dubeux, 210, note
Tartars (see Tatars)
Tashkent, 122
Tatar Khans, 182
Tatars, 30, 41, 60, 143
Buyar Lake, 30, 42
defeat by Genghis Khan, 42
Ta-tsin, 100
Tebtengri, 37, 38
Teheran, 132
Templars, Knights, 197, 199
Temujin (see Genghis Khan)
Temugu (brother of Genghis Khan), 38
Tengri, 33
Teutonic Knights, 197
T'ian shan, 35, 56, 111, 112, 141, 168
Tibet, 3, 71, 93, 153, 165, 166, 181, 183, 193
Tiflis, 134
Tilik Noyon, 141
Timur-i-lang (see Tamerlane)
Timur Malik, 118
Toghrul Khan (see Prester John)
Tokay, 198
Torguts, 182
Torture, Chinese, 54
Toukta Beg, 46, 133
Tours, 200
Trade, Development of, 153 Travels of Marco Polo, Yule-Cordier, 192, note
Tugh, 140
Tuli (son of Genghis Khan), 148, 159, 179
army of, 180
council, at, 167
death of, 205
duties of, 92
golden throne of, 147
Merv, storming of, 144
monarch, a, 175
Persia, invasion of, 144
power inherited by, 173
sons of, 180
strategy of, 144
Tulughma, 47, 194
Tuman, 61, 71
Turan, 107
Turkomans, 144, 149, 167
Turko-Mongols, Union of, 57
Turks, 54, 184
Twer, 183

U

Ugolin, Bishop of, 198
Ugurs, 41, 53, 60, 93, 135, 168, 188
writings of, 4
Urga, 29
Urgench, 134, 137, 148, 157
Uriankhi, The, 35
Uruts, 47
Uzbegs, 181

V

Vienna, 180
Vladimir, 183
Volga River, 3, 135, 169, 182, 205, 211

W

Wai Wang, Emperor, 72, 76, 133
  flight of, 80, 81
  policy of, weak, 80 pursued by Genghis Khan, 82 Wang Khan (see Prester John)
Wang-Yen, Prince, 85
Wazir, 107
Wenceslas, King, 197
Wines, effect of, 206 Persian, 168
Women, duties of, 26, 109
  Mangu's, 213
Writing, Syriac, 55

X

Xanadu, 154, note

Y

Yakka (see Mongols)
Yam, 150, 151, 153
Yamen, 156
Yang-tze River, 71, 79, 82
Yarlig, 209
Yaroslav, Duke, 199, 211
Yassa, 57, 90, 156, 189
Yellow River (see Yang-tze)
Ye Liu Chutsai, Prince, 86, 90, 111 administration of, 180 chancellor to khan, 179
  character of, 206
  death of, 208
  imprisonment of, 207 influence of, 179
  life of, 210, note
  Ogotai, power under, 207 report of campaign, 113, 118, 129, 166 sage of Cathay, 207 son of, 180
Yen-king, 63, 69, 70, 72, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 99 fall of, 86
Yessoutai, 36
Yesukai (father of Genghis Khan), 13, 17
  death of, 15
Yurt, 10, 13

Pinnacle Books announces with pride

THE COMPLETE HORATIO HORNBLOWER SAGA

by C. S. Forester is now available in paperback! ("the greatest naval adventures ever written")—all eleven volumes, plus The Hornblower Companion ("I know of no writer who has left us such a congenial glimpse of himself at work."—The New York Times, May '75) "FIRST-RATE SWASHBUCKLERS, RIFE WITH THE SMELL OF THE SEA, THE SWEEP OF ACTION . . . ONCE YOU ARE EXPOSED YOU ARE HOOKED FOREVER"—The New York Times

Check which ones you wish to order:

_____P381	Mr. Midshipman Hornblower #1	1.50
_____P382	Lieutenant Hornblower #2	1.50
_____P383	Hornblower and the Hotspur #3	1.50
_____P384	Hornblower and the Atropos #4	1.50
_____P385	Beat to Quarters #5	1.25
_____P386	Ship of the Line #6	1.25
_____P387	Flying Colors #7	1.25
_____P388	Commodore Hornblower #8	1.50
_____P389	Lord Hornblower #9	1.50
_____P390	Admiral Hornblower in the West Indies #10	1.50
_____P391	Hornblower During the Crisis #11	1.25
_____P440	Hornblower Companion	1.95

Simply send cover price, plus 25¢ per book for postage (up to $1.00 maximum—after that we pay postage) to:
PINNACLE BOOKS, 275 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016
PB-11

SHERLOCK HOLMES FANS! REJOICE—HERE IS SOLAR PONS, MASTER DETECTIVE IN SIX BRILLIANT DETECTIVE STORIES.

"Only August Derleth perceived the obvious truth—that the vacuum had to be filled. And how admirably Solar Pons fills it."

—The New York Times

"None is more worthy than Pons to wear the deerstalker."

—San Francisco Chronicle

"These stories recall, as nothing else has done, those delicious days and nights on Baker Street."

—Louisville Journal

"A tour de force . . . avowedly an imitation . . . it is more; it is an excellent series in detection in its own right."

—Chicago Tribune

SOLAR PONS by August Derleth (Complete)

_____	P477	REGARDING SHERLOCK HOLMES #1	1.25
_____	P507	THE CHRONICLES OF SOLAR PONS #2	1.25
_____	P543	THE MEMOIRS OF SOLAR PONS #3	1.25
_____	P585	THE CASEBOOK OF SOLAR PONS #4	1.50
_____	P629	THE REMINISCENCES OF SOLAR PONS #5	1.25
_____	P650	THE RETURN OF SOLAR PONS #6	1.50

And don't miss out on this all-time classic—just brought out in paperback for the first time ever!

_____	P695	THE PRIVATE LIFE OF SHERLOCK HOLMES by Vincent Starrett	1.95

Check which books you want and simply send cover price, plus 25¢ each for postage and handling (up to $1.00) to: PINNACLE BOOKS, 275 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016.

The Mongol Horde...

With their mighty Genghis Khan leading them they nearly ruled the earth!

The incredible war machine that Genghis Khan built is difficult to imagine even by modern standards. Cities in his path were obliterated, rivers diverted, deserts crowded with the fleeing and dying. In the wake of the ruthless horde birds of prey were often the sole living creatures to inhabit the bloody, ravaged land.

Such wholesale destruction can only be compared to modern nuclear warfare.

From a boyhood as a hunted outlaw, Genghis Khan rose meteorically to rule an empire more vast than any before or since. He was more gigantic in historical stature than Alexander, the Caesars, Napoleon, or Hitler. He laid waste a great part of China to provide grazing land for his horses, killed a hundred thousand Turks in one battle, and instilled a fear among the kingdoms of Europe that lasted for generations.

Relentlessly he fought, plundered, burned, raped, and slaughtered his way to victory, leaving a heritage of terror like a scar across the face of human history.

GE

0523008522